Be it enacted, etc., That section 3255 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by act of June 3, 1896 (29th Stat., p. 195), be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3255. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may exempt distillers of brandy made exclusively from apples, peaches, grapes, pears, pineapples, oranges, apricots, berries, plums, pawpaws, persimmons, prunes, figs, or cherries from any provision of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the tax thereon, when in his judgment it may seem expedient to do so: Provided, That where, in the manufacture of wine, artificial sweetening has been used the wine or the fruit pomace residuum may be used in the distillation of brandy, and such use shall not prevent the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, from exempting such distiller from any provision of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the tax thereon, when, in his judgment, it may seem expedient to do so."

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask a question of the Senator reporting the bill. I should like to know how much revenue is involved in the exemption of the brandy made from those articles.

Mr. LODGE. Nothing is exempted. The bill will save to the Government about $800,000 in revenue. The Senator, of course, in the confusion did not fully get the purpose of the bill. The language in which the word "exempt" occurs is the existing law, and the exemption applies to everything except taxation. It exempts it from the rules applying to whisky and other articles.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was read amid great confusion.

Mr. LODGE. The necessity arises from this fact. The law says "exclusively," and it has been held lately that if sugar is applied to the grapes or fruit before fermentation then it is not exclusively. It would throw out of business a large number of manufacturers who have been engaged in business for more than 40 years and cost the Government about $800,000 a year in revenue.

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill was read amid much confusion, and I caught it imperfectly, but in this day I am inclined to be rather on the watch for legislation that diminishes the revenues of the Government in one branch so that excuse may exist for changing them in another.

Mr. LODGE. This prevents a reduction of revenue.

Mr. OWEN. Let the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been once read. Does the Senator desire to have it read again?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the Secretary will again read the bill.

The bill was again read.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to have a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Down to the proviso it is the existing law. The Senator will notice that in that law it says "exclusively" as applied to the brandies made from fruits. It has been recently held by the Comptroller that if sugar was used with the fruits prior to fermentation it was no longer exclusively, and that fruit brandies did not therefore come within the provision of the law. There is quite a large manufacture in certain States, which has existed for some 40 years. At the request of the Treasury Department this bill was put in, as the decision would put an end to that form of industry and would cost the Government some $800,000 a year in revenue.

The bill has passed the House unanimously and is recommended by the department. All that is new is in the proviso, which says even if the sugar is used beforehand they can still be classified as fruit brandies.

Mr. OWEN. I have no objection to the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TAX ON ALCOHOL.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Finance, I report back favorably and ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 29857) to amend section 3287 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 6 of chapter 108 of an act approved May 28, 1880, at page 145, volume 21, United States Statutes at Large.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 3287 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 6 of chapter 108 of an act approved May 28, 1880, page 145, of volume 21, United States Statutes at Large, so as to read as follows:

Provided further, That alcohol or high-proof spirits withdrawn free of tax for the use of the United States, as authorized by section 3464, Revised Statutes, may be drawn off for transfer by pipes direct from the receiving cisterns in the cistern room of any distillery to closed metal storage tanks situated in the distillery bonded warehouse and transferred from such storage tanks to tanks or tank cars for shipment, upon the execution of such bonds and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATES OF DECEDENTS.

Mr. CULLOM. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 17433) amending section 1709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 1709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by the addition of the following paragraph:

Sixth. The Auditor for the State and other Departments shall act as conservator of such part of these estates as may be received at the Treasury, and for their protection the Secretary of the Treasury may order such effects to be sold as may consist of jewelry or other articles which have heretofore or may hereafter be received at the Treasury, and pay the expenses of such sale out of the proceeds, provided application for these effects shall not have been made by the legal claimant within two years after their receipt. The Auditor is authorized to indorse all bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other evidences of indebtedness due to such estates, and to take such steps as may be necessary for their collection. The proceeds of such sales, together with such other moneys as may be collected by him, shall be deposited into the Treasury in trust for the legal claimant, and be reported to the Secretary of State.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. BURROWS. From the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I report back favorably the bill (S. 10862) to alter the regulations respecting the manner of holding elections for Senators, which I ask may go to the calendar.

Mr. ROOT. I ask the chairman of the committee if it was not his intention to ask for the present consideration of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan stated that he wished the bill to go to the calendar.

Mr. ROOT. If the chairman of the committee expressed the wish that the bill should go to the calendar, I have nothing further to say; but if the Senator has no personal objection, as the bill relates to the matter of the election of Senators, I ask for its present consideration. Let the bill be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CULBERSON. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

CLAIMS FOR LOSS OR DAMAGE TO PRIVATE PROPERTY.

Mr. BURNHAM. From the Committee on Claims, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 10890) for the payment of certain claims for damages to and loss of private property.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of that bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $25,535.22 for payment of 200 approved claims for damages to and loss of private property belonging to citizens of the United States, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands that have arisen previous to February 21, 1911, estimated for in House Documents Nos. 1242 and 1404, Sixty-first Congress, third session.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AFFAIRS IN ALASKA.

Mr. PILES. I submit a concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 42), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee of both Houses of Congress is hereby appointed, to be composed of five members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Presiding Officer thereof, and five members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker thereof; and any vacancy on the committee shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. The said committee is hereby empowered and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to sit during the sessions or recess of Congress at such times and places as they may deem desirable, to visit Alaska and make a thorough investigation of existing conditions and of the resources and needs of that Territory, to employ a stenographer and such other assistants as may be necessary to carry out the purposes for which such committee is created.

The said joint committee shall conclude its investigation and report to the Sixty-second Congress the result thereof, together with its recommendations concerning such legislation as may be advisable regarding Alaska. The expenses incurred by said joint committee shall be paid equally out of the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and of the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives, respectively.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. BURROWS. Let the resolution go over.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not object to the consideration of the resolution. It is a matter of importance, and not something of mere passing moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the law the resolution will have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and therefore can not be acted upon now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the morning business closes I wish to ask that a certain portion of a letter submitted and read into the RECORD on the 21st day of February, 1911, be expunged therefrom. The letter is one which deals with the subject of Canadian reciprocity, and, while it contains many important and strong points on that subject, it also contains some things that ought not to have gone into the RECORD. The writer of that letter stated:

I am so stirred up that I can not but express my resentment.

And he carried this spirit into his letter so strongly that I think he gave vent to some expressions which, if he had considered them, he would not have cared to be spread upon the RECORD.

Mr. President, the portion of the letter which I ask to have expunged refers to Mr. James J. Hill, and it, to some extent, questions his integrity and capability. As one of the representatives of the great Northwest, I feel it incumbent upon me to say that there is no man in the whole country who has done more for the upbuilding, and for the general welfare of the entire northwestern section of this country than has Mr. Hill, and I know of no American citizen who is more patriotic, sincere, ardent, and industrious than is he, in laboring for what he considers the best interest of the country. The great irrigation project which is to make productive vast sections of the West is only one of the fruits of his careful investigations and zealous labor. The value of his studious life in bringing home to the country the rapid and worse than wasteful exhaustion of our national resources, and his instructive addresses over the whole country on the subject of increasing the fertility and productiveness of our farms, are beyond computation. While I am compelled to differ from him upon the effect of the Canadian reciprocity matter, I can not question, nor do I think any other person can justly question, the patriotism of his purpose or his integrity in compiling and presenting facts and figures to the public.

Mr. President, this letter was received by my colleague, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], and was immediately presented without much time for careful reading. I am certain that had he read over carefuly every paragraph of it, he would have bluepenciled certain portions before he asked that the letter should go into the RECORD. The RECORD should contain no personality or vitriolic accusation of any character against any person. I was going to suggest to my colleague that he himself, inasmuch as he asked for the reading of the letter, should request that the portion to which I have referred be expunged; but, inasmuch as he is not present in the Chamber at this time, I can say that I have talked with him upon the subject, and that I am certain that he agrees with me, and that he would say to the Senate were he present that this portion inadvertently printed into the RECORD ought to be expunged.

I will therefore ask, Mr. President, that on page 3040, second column, of the RECORD of February 21, after the word "us," in the eleventh line of the tenth paragraph of the letter, all that follows, down to and including the word "rot," be stricken out, and also that all but the first four lines of the second paragraph from the bottom of the column be expunged, so that the paragraph will close with the word "way." I ask that the order may be made at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and the matter referred to will be expunged from the RECORD.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the following bills:

ATLANTIC COAST LINE RAILROAD CO.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 1126, being the bill (S. 10397) for the relief of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKETT. I object to the consideration of any bills by unanimous consent, unless we can go to the calendar and consider the bills there in regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska objects.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President, last Wednesday when I made some remarks to the Senate, in referring to the organization of the forty-sixth general assembly I made reference to a member of that body, Francis Brady, and I also referred to the use of patronage in organizing that body. Yesterday the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] read into the RECORD statements attempting to refute some of the statements that I made. I have a telegram, which I send to the Secretary's desk, from the speaker of the forty-sixth general assembly, and I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., February 27, 1911.

Hon. WILLIAM LORIMER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Representative Francis P. Brady came to my office and pledged his vote for me for speaker voluntarily in November, 1908. Later he returned and said it was against Gov. Deneen's wishes and he could not be for me, that it would lose him his State patronage and he withdrew his pledge of support.

EDWARD D. SHURTLEFF.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President, I also present a telegram from Representative Brownback, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., February 27, 1911.

Hon. WILLIAM LORIMER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Report that Gov. Deneen made no effort to organize the forty-sixth general assembly is absolutely untrue. He urged me to join his forces and insisted that he would defeat Shurtleff for speaker even if it was necessary to use all of the patronage of his office. J. W. Ford, president of Ford Manufacturing Co., was present at this interview.

D. D. BROWNBACK.

Mr. LORIMER. I submit a further telegram.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the third telegram.

The Secretary read as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., February 27, 1911.

Hon. WILLIAM LORIMER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I was present when Gov. Deneen told Representative Brownback that he was doing everything within his power to defeat Shurtleff for speaker for the Forty-sixth General Assembly of Illinois and that he was certain that he would win the fight. Deneen promised Representative Brownback in my presence, among other things, that he would make me a commissioner of southern Illinois penitentiary in case he aided him in Shurtleff's defeat.

J. W. FORD, Jr.

HOT SPRINGS (ARK.) RESERVATION.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of two bills. One supplements the other. They relate to the Hot Springs in Arkansas and are matters necessary to the due administration of affairs there. It will require but a moment or two to consider both of them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none.

The bill (H. R. 32082) limiting the privileges of the Government free bathhouse on the public reservation at Hot Springs, Ark., to persons who are without and unable to obtain the means to pay for baths was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (H. R. 31806) to amend section 1 of the act approved March 2, 1907, being an act to amend an act entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon United States commissioners over offenses committed on a portion of the permanent Hot Springs Mountain Reservation, Ark.," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GREELEY-ARIZONA IRRIGATION CO.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 10808) to authorize the Greeley-Arizona Irrigation Co. to build a dam across the Colorado River at or near Head Gate Rock, near Parker, in Yuma County, Ariz.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands with amendments, on page 1, after the word "dam," in line 5, to strike out the words "twelve feet high," and on page 2, line 3, after the word "within," to strike out "five" and insert "four," so as to read:

That the Greeley-Arizona Irrigation Co., a corporation organized under the laws of Arizona, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a diversion dam in and across the Colorado River at a place known as Head Gate Rock, near Parker, Yuma County, in the Territory of Arizona, in accordance with the provisions of the act approved June 23, 1910, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 21, 1906:" Provided, That the actual construction of said dam shall be begun within two years and completed within four years from the date of the passage of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

G. A. EMBRY.

Mr. BRADLEY. I desire to call up and ask immediate consideration of the bill (S. 5037) for the relief of G. A. Embry.

Mr. STONE. I gave notice that after the reading of the Journal this morning I would proceed to address the Senate on the resolution relating to the right of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] to occupy his seat. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] gave notice that he would proceed at 2 o'clock. I have been depending upon the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to see to it that two hours, at least, were not taken up with other matters.

I now give notice on my own account, which is rather a delicate and embarrassing thing for me or for any other Senator or gentleman to do, that after this bill has been disposed of I shall object to the consideration of any other bill. I wish to say that I do so solely because I do not wish to trespass further than is necessary upon the Senator from Oklahoma.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to G. A. Embry, of Estill County, Ky., $200 in full compensation for services rendered the United States during the war with Spain.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan asks that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. A resolution (S. Res. 315) relative to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as Senator from the State of Illinois.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, because of an illness from which I suffered during December and the early part of January my vitality was somewhat impaired, and as I have not yet recovered from the exhausting experiences of last night I do not know whether I will be strong enough to complete what I have to say or not. Nevertheless I will do the best I can.

Mr. President, before I take up the matter immediately before the Senate I desire to advert briefly to two other matters not connected with the Lorimer case. The first of these relates to something which occurred here last night. During the proceedings last night, when the chair was occupied by a distinguished Senator, not by the Vice President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] rose, simultaneously with other Senators, and asked recognition of the Chair, which was given him. He then demanded that when the vote should be taken on the pending resolution—that is, the Lorimer resolution—it should be taken by yeas and nays.

Immediately I rose to my feet. Two other Senators—the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]—also rose immediately, and all of us addressed the Chair with such vigor and volume of voice as we could command. The Chair would not recognize us, but proceeded arbitrarily to submit the question to the Senate, whether the yeas and nays should be ordered.

After that I raised the question of order that the Chair had no right under the rules and the parliamentary practice obtaining in this body to persist in submitting that question to the Senate when Senators were clamoring for recognition. The Chair overruled the point of order, and from that ruling I appealed. The Chair submitted it to the Senate, and the Senate by a decisive vote sustained the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the question involved at length. I well know that there are other Senators so much better versed in the rules of the Senate and the procedure which has characterized this body for years, and with parliamentary law in general, that I prefer to leave a full discussion of the question involved to them on some suitable future occasion, and I have assurance that that will be done when such an occasion presents itself.

I wish now merely to register my protest against the accuracy of the ruling I challenged. I know it has one or two precedents made in the recent past to support it, precedents established very much in the same way as this one. Mr. President, I desire to say that if that ruling is to stand as the permanent judgment of the Senate, then we have now already practically established cloture. We have now a rule of parliamentary procedure against which many of the greatest Senators who have ever served in this body have resolutely and consistently stood, and it never found a place in the laws governing the Senate until within a very recent date.

Mr. President, if an alert occupant of the chair, instinct with the spirit of usurption, refuses to see, hear, or recognize a Senator when he rises to address the Chair, as I did last night, and persists in ignoring his calls for recognition, and goes on in spite of protests to submit the demand for the yeas and nays, and to count the hands uplifted in support of the demand, and to declare that the yeas and nays have been ordered—if that is to be the permanent policy and rule of the Senate, then we have reached a point when substantial cloture exists in this body. With the occupant of the chair in sympathy with and having knowledge of the purpose of the Senator whom he recognizes, it can easily be arranged for the recognition of the favored Senator, submit his demand to the Senate in spite of clamorous protests, and declare that the yeas and nays have been ordered. If that is to be the rule of conduct, then we have progressed or receded, as you may regard it, in the parliamentary procedure of the Senate of the United States.

With an alert and willing occupant of the chair, aided by a well-coached clerk sitting just in his front, he can, with the slightest lull in the proceedings, start the roll call, and thus end the debate by sharp practice.

Mr. President, I have heard Senators on this floor within a week, as well as on former occasions, protest in eloquent terms against the Sutherland amendment to the resolution providing for the direct election of Senators, saying it opened a way to the enactment of a force bill and to other statutory evils that might afflict any State or section of the country, and at this time and in the immediate future, the Southern States especially.

Mr. President, I devoutly hope no such legislative crime as a force bill will be presented to the Congress of the United States in future. I hardly believe one will be, and yet it is within the scope of the possible, may I not even say the probable, that many extremely objectionable measures of one kind or another may be forced through the Senate without deliberate consideration and full debate and by the arbitrary denial of a Senator's parliamentary rights.

I think this is a question that Senators on both sides of this Chamber should deeply reflect upon. If this precedent is a bad one, it should be set aside. It is highly important that it be looked into, that it may be determined whether it so reflects the final, thoughtful, and deliberate judgment of the Senate that it should stand. I can not believe that the great Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who has served with such distinction and great influence in this body for a generation, believes in the correctness of this ruling, and I am confident no Senator on this side would consent to such a change in the parliamentary practice of the Senate as this ruling would bring about.

Saying this much, Mr. President, I will dismiss the subject, at least for the present. I may recur to it on some other and more opportune occasion.

There is one other subject not connected with the Lorimer case to which I desire to advert. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] moved this morning—and I think very properly—to expunge certain parts of a letter inserted a few days since in the RECORD at the instance and on the request of his colleague [Mr. GRONNA]. At the time the letter was read the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] intimated an objection to having a letter phrased as that was being incorporated in the RECORD, but he did not press the objection. Shortly afterwards, because of the personally offensive nature of the letter, I made a direct objection to its insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but the Chair ruled that as the Senate had given consent to the reading of the paper an objection would not prevent its being read; but he said he would submit it to the Senate, which he did, and the Senate, by a vote, authorized the whole letter to be read and inserted in the RECORD. This letter may have made special reference to others, I do not recall, but the gentleman to whom the paper particularly referred was Mr. James J. Hill, the official head of the Great Northern Railway. I do not know why Mr. Hill addressed this letter to me, but he did. I think it appropriate in the circumstances that this communication from Mr. Hill should also be inserted in the RECORD. The letter is as follows:

ST. PAUL, MINN., February 25, 1911.

Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The newspapers contain an account of Senator GRONNA, of South Dakota, having procured the reading in the Senate of a letter in which was stated a number of assumed prices of wheat in Winnipeg, Chicago, etc., and that Great Northern stock went from 129 to 136 on the day after the reciprocity agreement was passed by the House. The attached memorandum, which I have prepared, conclusively disposes of both statements.

I also inclose a copy of an article written by a North Dakota farmer entitled "The tariff brought home," which I think you will find interesting.

Yours, very truly, JAS. J. HILL.

The matter referred to in Mr. Hill's communication is as follows; and to this I invite the considerate, if not prayerful, attention of the Senate, and especially of the Senators from North Dakota:

MR. HILL'S MEMORANDUM.

According to the news reports, Senator GRONNA, of North Dakota, procured the reading in the United States Senate of a letter in which it was stated that wheat prices are now higher in Winnipeg than in Chicago, although they were formerly lower, and that Great Northern stock went from 129 to 136 on the day after the reciprocity agreement was passed by the House. The Senator makes himself as directly responsible for these statements, if they are correctly reported, as if he had uttered them himself. Senator MCCUMBER, of North Dakota, is also said to have stated that American wheat prices have been for many years from 13 to 17 cents higher on the American than on the Canadian side of the line. Both Senators are fighting reciprocity on the ground that it will injure the American farmer. They both show a fine disregard of facts, which the country is coming to expect from opponents of the treaty. Since their attacks is inspired by public statements made by me, the facts should be stated.

I have taken the closing prices of May wheat as officially reported for each day of the months of November, 1910, January, 1911, and the first 16 days of February on which the exchanges were open in February of both 1910 and 1911. This covers the period to February 21, 1911. I have averaged these figures to obtain the monthly averages for each of the three great markets—Chicago, Minneapolis, and Winnipeg. The results are not opinions, but facts. The following are the figures:

	Chicago.	Minneapolis.	Winnipeg.
November, 1910	96	105.4	95
January, 1911	99.6	106.5	98.6
February, 1910 (16 days)	111.5	111.7	106.1
February, 1911 (16 days)	93.7	100	95.6

A year ago Chicago and Minneapolis prices were practically identical. Eight months later the Minneapolis price was 9.4 cents higher. A year later it was 6.3 cents lower. Did tariff or reciprocity make these changes? Last February Winnipeg was 5.6 cents below Minneapolis, and 5.4 below Chicago. Now it is 1.9 cents above Chicago and 4.4 cents below Minneapolis. With adverse freight charges of 10 and 16 cents per bushel how would Winnipeg wheat affect Minneapolis and Chicago? May wheat this month was 11.7 cents lower than it was the same month last year in Minneapolis. It was 17.8 lower in Chicago than it was a year ago. Look at the Winnipeg wheat market during the time when reciprocity was being most actively considered. May wheat sold in Winnipeg at 97⅛ on the first day of the present month. It fell to 94⅛ on the 15th. On the 23d it fell to 91⅛, or 6 cents below the price of three weeks before. All the opponents of annexation in Canada are shouting that it will reduce the price of Canadian wheat, while on our side they are shouting that it will depress the American price. Their claims destroy each other. Therefore, according to the line of argument used by the gentlemen cited, the proposal of reciprocity has caused wheat to fall 50 per cent more in Chicago than in Minneapolis. There is no end to the absurdities and contradictions that may be created by this method as long as this country is a large exporter of wheat.

Prices, as I have shown, vary just as much and more between local markets in this country where there is no tariff. For 10 years the average price in California has been 12 cents a bushel higher than in Oregon, and in South Carolina 13 cents higher than in North Carolina. The highest price of wheat for May delivery in Chicago varied last year from $1.11⅞ in August to 98 cents in November; from $1.05⅛ in October to 98 cents in November. The table given above exhibits far more singular fluctuations in respect to where the tariff can not apply than in those where it does.

The basic price of wheat is fixed in Liverpool and varies with the world's supply and demand. It has been affected by a visible supply ranging from 20,000,000 to 40,000,000 bushels and upward larger than a year ago, and by a world's yield which some estimate as high as 25,000,000 bushels larger. The local markets have additional variations from purely local causes. Minneapolis is reported as having nearly three times as much wheat in store as she had a year ago. Therefore the Minneapolis price has declined. To ascribe such changes, whose causes are perfectly visible, to tariff or reciprocity is like charging the comet with an epidemic of infantile paralysis.

Referring briefly to the price of Great Northern stock, which has no connection with this matter except in minds either ignorant or lacking frankness, the official record shows that the highest quotation this year was 131⅛ on the 1st day of February. It was 132⅞ last October, when the reciprocity question had not been raised. Last March it was 140⅞ and last January 143⅞.

Let us dispense with oratory and get back to facts. They are stated as above. The man who is afraid to face them or misrepresents them is the one who must give an account of himself.

[From North Dakota Farmer.]

THE TARIFF BROUGHT HOME.

The Civic Club at the university considers as its peculiar province the work of studying and gathering information on public questions. During the past year many matters of considerable interest have been considered, but none are of greater significance than the topic that was treated at last Friday's meeting.

"North Dakota and the Tariff" was the topic which was treated by George Shafer, who is one of the most active members of the club and one of the heavyweights. He has given a great deal of study to the matter, as he was a member of the debating team which represented the university in this year's contest against Hamline University, at which time this question was the bone of contention. George is a real North Dakota product himself, a resident of McKenzie County, and an alumnus of the Williston High School. He is a close and careful student of North Dakota people and North Dakota conditions. In discussing the effect of the tariff in our State he said in part as follows:

Of all the questions before the public mind at the present time none has aroused more interest and none more widespread discussion than that of the tariff. For the first time in many years people in every part of the country are seriously asking themselves the question, Do the benefits derived from the tariff compensate for its injury to the country? North Dakota, like most of the other States, has always indorsed a high tariff, but it, like many of the others, has begun to doubt the wisdom of its action. It is with the purpose of showing the effect of the tariff on North Dakota that this task is undertaken.

There is only one way in which a protective tariff can be of any benefit to a State or nation. That is, by keeping out or obstructing foreign competition and establishing what is known as a home market. So, in order to determine whether the tariff helps North Dakota, it is necessary to determine what North Dakota produces and to investigate the condition of the markets in which those products are sold.

NORTH DAKOTA AN AGRICULTURAL STATE.

North Dakota is primarily an agricultural State, and 73 per cent of its people are engaged in one form or another of that industry. The two chief branches of that industry are the production of grains and the raising of stock. For many years vast hordes of cattle were raised and fattened on its western plains, and the Red River Valley has long since attained the reputation of being called the "Bread basket of the world." At the present time there are nearly 2,000,000 head of live stock in the State, valued at $77,000,000. In 1907 about $3,000,000 worth of cattle, horses, sheep, and hogs were sold outside of the State. There are 10,500,000 acres of land under cultivation, and still the great plains of the western portion are but scarcely touched. In the production of grains North Dakota is progressing with leaps and bounds. The amount of wheat produced in 1908 was 58,428,000 bushels, while that produced in 1900 was 13,176,213 bushels. (Statistical Abstract of United States, 1908, p. 132.) Nearly the same ratio of increase prevails in the production of oats, flax, barley, etc. It should be remembered also that North Dakota produces more than one-half of all the flax used in this country. Hence, it will be seen from these facts, that not only has North Dakota been a great agricultural State in the past, but that it is destined to remain so for generations to come.

TARIFF DOES NOT AFFECT PRICE OF NORTH DAKOTA PRODUCTS.

Now the question arises, Does our protective tariff in any way increase the prices of either grains or stock to the people of this State? I do not hesitate to say that it does not now, and has not in the past, added one cent to the market price of either product. The reasons are obvious. The United States is the greatest agricultural nation on earth, and its products find their way into the ports of every civilized country. At the present time, and long before North Dakota came into existence as a State, the United States was annually exporting a large surplus of grain and stock. And the prices of both grain and stock are not determined in the local markets, but in the markets of the world. Liverpool is the barometer of the world's market. There the prices rise and fall, according to the supply and demand, and every rise and fall is reflected in the markets of every country. The difference between the price of wheat at home and abroad practically equals the cost of transportation from here to Liverpool, and no more. All other fluctuations are due to conditions in the home market. So long as we export wheat the tariff can not affect the price. It is, therefore, difficult to see how a duty of 25 cents per bushel on wheat helps the farmer of North Dakota, when the price of his product is determined in Europe.

That the tariff will not prevent the price of wheat from going down so long as we are exporting a surplus is evidenced by past experience. Under the Dingley law, for instance, we had the same duty on wheat that we have now, yet everyone knows that prices ranged all the way from 60 cents to $1.25 per bushel during the 13 years that law was in force. Also under the Wilson bill, the much-heralded free-trade measure, there was a duty of 25 cents per bushel on wheat, yet the price went down to the rate of 40 and 50 cents per bushel. The man who says that the tariff on wheat is the cause for the present high prices must utterly disregard historical experience. It is very plain that in no case has the tariff prevented the price of wheat from falling, nor can it do so as long as the United States is exporting a surplus.

The situation regarding flax is little different from that of the other grains. North Dakota is the greatest producer of flaxseed in the United States. In 1908 the crop amounted to 13,770,000 bushels. But notwithstanding such large crops, the United States exports no flax whatever, and imports but very little, only enough for seed. That being the case, the duty of 25 cents per bushel on flaxseed is of no avail whatever, and the price in this country is determined almost entirely by the supply and demand. The reason the price of flax has ranged between $2 and $2.50 per bushel during the past few months is in no way due to the tariff, but to the fact that the supply has not kept pace with the demand.

Let us now notice a few facts concerning our export and import trade in breadstuffs. The following table is taken from the Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1908, pages 400 and 433:

Breadstuffs exported in year ending June 30, 1908.

Barley	bushels	4,349,078
Bread and biscuit	pounds	13,052,074
Buckwheat	bushels	116,127
Corn	do	52,445,800
Corn meal	barrels	654,515
Oats	bushels	1,158,622
Oatmeal	pounds	24,484,199
Rye	bushels	2,419,958
Rye flour	barrels	4,105
Wheat	bushels	100,371,057
Wheat flour	barrels	13,927,247
Total value		$215,260,588

The above figures represent the largest surpluses of breadstuffs exported since 1903.

Breadstuffs imported in the year ending June 30, 1908.

Barley	bushels	199,741
Corn	do	20,312
Oats	do	364,307
Oatmeal	do	344,003
Rye	do	17
Wheat	do	341,617
Wheat flour	barrels	39,593
Total value		$7,138,214

A comparison of these figures will give some idea of the difference in the amounts of our exports and imports. The amount of wheat that we import, for instance, is insignificant as compared with what we export. And that little amount comes from Canada, and after being made into flour becomes a part of our exports.

The situation concerning stock is about the same as that of breadstuffs. For generations the United States has been a great exporter of cattle, horses, sheep, and hogs, and North Dakota has always furnished its share of the supply, particularly of cattle and horses. Western North Dakota was for years considered one of the greatest stock-raising regions in America, and although the form of the industry is changing, still great numbers are forthcoming. The tariff on stock, as on grains, is of no value whatever. There is a duty of $30 per head on horses, and the American horse is found in every continent. There is a duty of $14 per head on cattle, and American beef is eaten by the people of every nation in Europe. There is a tariff on pork, and the American hog has routed his way through the swamps of every country on the globe. In fact, sheep is the only animal that has failed to withstand foreign competition, and most of them have long since left North Dakota, there being only one or two herds in the western part of the State.

The following statistics will throw some light on our export and import trade in stock. (Statistical Abstract of United States, 1908, pp. 398, 433.)

Animals exported and imported in year ending June 30, 1908:

	Exported.	Imported.
Horses	10,000	5,484
Cattle	349,210	92,356
Hogs	3,818

Total value exports	$34,101,284
Total value imports	4,777,454

That the tariff has in no way enhanced the prices of horses, beef, or pork to the producer is self-evident from these facts. This, however, does not mean that the tariff has not raised the price of beef and pork to the consumer, as will be shown later.

TARIFF ON MINOR PRODUCTS.

Besides the duties on grain and stock, several other minor products of North Dakota, such as eggs, potatoes, etc., are also well protected. As we neither export nor import potatoes, it is impossible for the tariff to in any way affect their price. And the only time it ever could affect them would be in the event of an emergency when there is a shortage in the crop. Then the people would be given the privilege of paying 25 cents per bushel more for imported potatoes than what they would otherwise have to pay. There is a duty of 5 cents per dozen on eggs, and in the year ending June 30, 1908, the United States exported 7,590,977 dozen, while our imports were less than one-fourth of a million dozen. Unless American hens go on a strike there is no danger of the tariff ever affecting the price of eggs.

AMERICAN PRODUCTS CHEAPEST IN WORLD.

But it may be assumed that the tariff upon these various agricultural products has made up for an unfavorable cost of production at home and abroad. That, however, is not true. Notwithstanding the fact that farm labor in the United States is the highest in the world, yet, because of the great fertility from soil, the energy and enterprise of our people, and the use of modern labor-saving machines, the American farmer can produce more cheaply and undersell the farmers of every nation on the globe. The fact that American products are daily selling in Liverpool, in competition with the products produced by the pauper labor of Europe, China, and India, is prima facie evidence of the truth of that statement. But there is other authority sustaining that proposition. Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER, Senator from New Hampshire, in an address in the United States Senate, said: "As regards power of production, Mulhall has shown that a farm hand in the United States does as much as 2 in the United Kingdom, 3 in Germany, 5 in Austria, and 7 in Russia. The farm laborers of Europe do nine times the work to get double the result of the farm laborers of the United States. That is, it takes 4½ Europeans to equal 1 American. Extend the comparison to Asia and Africa, and we find that the average producer in the United States is equal to 10 the world over, outside of our own country. (Citation: "The Tariff and the Trusts," by Franklin Pierce, p. 230.)

Thus we find, not only that the products of North Dakota have been sold in direct competition with those of the other countries of the world, not only that we are now and always have been producing cheaper than any country in either hemisphere, but we search in vain to discover wherein up to the present time the farmers of this State have realized one dollar by reason of the existence of a protective tariff. If North Dakota has been benefited by the tariff it must be in other realms than that of agriculture.

TARIFF BENEFITS NO INDUSTRY IN NORTH DAKOTA.

Continuing our investigation, then, let us find if possible what people or industry of North Dakota has been benefited by the tariff. In taking a general survey of the State we notice that the tariff has established no factories, built no mills, stimulated the operation of no mines, fostered no "infant industries," and raised no man's wages. We must conclude, then, that up to the present time the tariff has lent no assistance to the development and prosperity of North Dakota.

CHIEF ARGUMENT GIVEN FOR TARIFF.

However, the chief argument that has been given in justification of protective duties on agricultural products is not that they in any way enhance the prices now, but that they will protect the farmer from the dangers of foreign competition in the future. Attention is called to the fact that the population of the United States is increasing at a greater ratio than our grain supply, and that in a few years this country will be importing cereals in large quantities. It is also pointed out that Canada, our neighbor to the north, is rapidly coming forward as a wheat-producing country; that by the time our country ceases to export wheat, our markets will be flooded with the wheat from Canada; and the high tariff is the only thing that can save the price of wheat from becoming ruinously low, and the consequent destruction of the wheat-raising industry in North Dakota.

UNITED STATES WILL NOT BECOME IMPORTING NATION.

At the first glance it would seem that the situation was indeed serious, but upon more mature reflection we find that there is really no cause for alarm. Of course it is true that we are not exporting such a large surplus of wheat as in former years, and that Canada is destined to become a great wheat-producing country, but at the same time there is no likelihood of our becoming an importer of wheat for a number of years to come. Senator P. J. MCCUMBER, in an address in Grand Forks on November 12, 1909, admitted that it would be from five to eight years (Grand Forks Herald, Nov. 13, 1909). But that seems to fall far short of the mark. It utterly overlooks the fact that the wheat crop in this country is also increasing at a rapid rate. In 1890 the total wheat crop in the United States was 399,262,000 bushels, in 1900 it was 522,229,504 bushels, and in 1908 it was 664,602,000 bushels. (Statistical Abstract of United States, 1908, p. 126.) An increase, you will observe, of more than 264,000,000 bushels, or 66 per cent in 18 years.

Let us look at the question from another standpoint. Senator McCUMBER says that it takes 6½ bushels of wheat per year to supply each person in the United States. Assuming our present population to be 90,000,000, we have increased 14,000,000 in 10 years, and at a rate of one and four-tenths millions per year. It therefore takes an increase of nine and one-tenth million bushels of wheat per year to supply the increase in the population. Now, in 1900 our total wheat production was 522,000,000 bushels, speaking in round numbers, while that in 1908 was 664,000,000 bushels, an increase of 142,000,000 bushels in 8 years, and an average increase of seventeen and three-quarter million bushels per year—almost twice as much as is necessary to supply the increase in population. Let me also call your attention to the fact that the average yearly increase in wheat product for the decade of 1890–1900 was but twelve and three-tenths million bushels, more than 5,000,000 bushels per year less than that of the following 8 years. Assuming that our annual wheat crop remains the same as that produced in 1908, and that our population increases at a rate of one and a half millions each year, it will be 10 years before our surplus will be consumed. In view of these facts it would seem that the statement that our surplus will be extinguished in 5 years is but a forceful creation of the imagination.

WHEAT-GROWING LAND NOT YET EXHAUSTED.

The further fact is overlooked that not as yet have we put under the plow all of the wheat-producing land in this country, but that western North Dakota and eastern Montana, comprising that vast stretch of territory known in the days gone by as the "Great plains of the West," where for years innumerable herds of cattle, horses, and sheep were wont to roam, is but scarcely touched by the hand of the grain grower. In the year of 1908 only 3,703,000 bushels of wheat was grown in Montana. When this great region is finally put under cultivation there is no reason whatever why it should not be as prolific in the production of grain as it was in the production of stock.

That as a nation we shall not soon be importing wheat is evidenced by the further fact that our export surplus has not been decreasing steadily in the last 5 years. In the year ending June 30, 1908, we exported 100,371,057 bushels of wheat, which was the largest surplus exported since 1903. In fact, there has been a steady increase in our exports of wheat since 1905, in which year we exported only 4,394,402 bushels. (Statistical Abstract of United States, 1908, p. 433.) It would be exceedingly hard to say just when the United States will cease to be an exporter of wheat, but from these facts it is safe to predict that such a time is still far distant, at least, or 25 years hence. When that time does come, however, and the farmers are able to maintain the high duties on wheat, then there is no denying that they will be able to take advantage of the necessities of the people and compel them to pay high prices for the breadstuffs. The best that can be said on this point is that there is no hope of the farmer of North Dakota getting any benefit from the tariff in the immediate future, and it is only in the event that he is able to maintain it for a number of years to come will he ever receive any benefit from it.

With reference to the possibility of North Dakota's getting any benefit from the tariff on barley, rye, oats, and other agricultural products, the situation is about the same as that of wheat. It is at least no better and, in all probability, not so good.

The situation regarding the future stock market may be dismissed with a word. In the first place, there seems to be no danger of any foreign competition that will affect the home market. This is well shown by the fact that our exports in cattle and horses have not decreased materially for 10 years, excepting 1908 and 1909. The total value of our exports in 1899 was $37,880,916, while that of 1908 was $24,101,389. (Statistical Abstract of United States, 1908, p. 432.)

Our final conclusions upon the question as to whether North Dakota receives any benefit from our protective tariff is as follows: That in the past it has received no benefit; that at the present time it is receiving no benefit; that for a number of years to come it will receive no benefit; and that there is only a remote possibility of its ever getting any good out of it in the future.

Having found that our protective tariff in no way helps the people of North Dakota, we turn now to consider the more vital question, Does it injure them; and if so, in what way and how much?

TARIFF A BURDEN.

At the outset it should be borne in mind that protection, like any other institution, is in a certain sense a burden—that is, it costs something to maintain it. There is a tariff on nearly everything we consume as well as on everything we produce. Our people are at the same time consumers as well as producers. So that in order to maintain the tariff upon the articles which they produce they must pay for that protection by bearing the burden of the duties upon the products which they buy and consume. We have seen that since our Nation yearly exports a large surplus of farm products, and that since the agricultural industry is not controlled by a trust or monopoly, that the tariff has no effect upon the prices. That, however, is not true with respect to that enormous number of manufactured articles which our people are daily consuming. The reason for that is very clear. If we purchase an imported article we must necessarily pay the amount of the tariff more than that we would otherwise have to pay for it. If we buy an article made or controlled by a monopoly, we pay an added price, equal approximately to the tariff, for the tariff is one of the things which makes it possible for the trust to impose high prices. For instance, if the normal price of a given article is $25 and the tariff rate is 50 per cent, then the home monopoly may, by virtue of that 50 per cent protection, raise the price to $35, and until the price is raised beyond that mark tariff competition can have no effect upon the same. On the other hand, if there was no tariff on that article foreign competition would prevent the price from going beyond $25. So since the average rate in the Payne-Aldrich tariff law is 50–52 per cent, the average increase in the prices of trust-made goods, due to the tariff, is in all probability in the neighborhood of 50 per cent.

COMPETITION IS STIFLED.

In this connection it should be remembered that there is but little competition in this country in the production of the most of the necessaries of life, excepting, of course, agricultural products. And even many of those, such as meat, for instance, is controlled in the home markets. Mr. Franklin Pierce, of the New York bar, in his remarkable book, "The Tariff and the Trusts," says that there are more than 400 trusts in this country covering the production and marketing of most of the manufactured articles. Mr. Lee Francis Tybaryer, of Philadelphia, in his recent book, "The Tariff," makes the startling statement that more than one-third of all the property in this country is in the hands of monopolies. This last statement is, no doubt, somewhat exaggerated, but at the same time there is no denying the fact that industry is very highly organized, and that a few large corporations are in absolute control of the output of many of our factories, and that these trusts are dictating to the people of this country the prices they must pay.

Under the old régime it was not denied that the tariff increased the cost of commodities to the consumers, but competition in the home market was relied upon to prevent the prices from becoming exorbitant. To-day, however, since most of the competition is stifled and the great monopolies reign supreme, the people must patiently bear the added burden. It is obvious, then, that while the people of North Dakota are free from the advantages of the tariff, they are not free from its disadvantages; that its burdens are many and great; and that its injuries are felt every time either an imported or American-made article is sold within the boundaries of the State. The ordinary citizen feels the burden of the tariff when he buys the clothes for himself and family, the carpet on the floor, the furniture in the house, the cooking utensils in the kitchen, the sugar he puts in his food, the tea and coffee he drinks, the musical instruments, if he has any, the watches and clocks which keep his time, the brooms, the glassware, the firearms, the lumber out of which his house is built, the nails used in the house, and the many other things which he must have in order to live in a civilized community. If the consumer happens to be a farmer, he pays liberally for his protection when he buys his mowers, roller, disks, harrows, plows, binders, thrashing machines, wagons, seeders, cultivators, tools, wire, harness, buggies, and the thousand other things which he must have in order to run the farm and raise the products, which he must sell in a market where the tariff can have no rising effect upon their prices. Of course, all these articles are not trust made or controlled, but most of them are, and those that are not soon will be.

NORTH DAKOTA AT MERCY OF TRUSTS.

Some people are of the opinion that since ours is an agricultural State, and that since no trusts are organized under our laws, North Dakota is not dependent upon the trusts. Campaign orators often flatter the farmer by telling him he is the most independent man on earth; that he feeds all the people in the country; and that the Nation bows humbly at his feet. However charming that may sound to the ear, it is not true. No man is more dependent upon the manufacturer than is the farmer, and no State is more at the mercy of the monopolies than is North Dakota. Our State is one of the richest markets for trust-made goods in the world. Its broad fields are "ripe unto the harvests" all the time. And the monopolies are reaping their enormous profits from those fields "by night and by day." It is true that no trust is organized within our boundaries, but nevertheless our people are daily purchasing the products of each of the 400 trusts in this Union, and have been doing so since the time North Dakota was ushered into statehood.

PEOPLE DISCRIMINATED AGAINST.

Authorities do not agree as to the amounts the people of this country are yearly compelled to contribute to the trusts by virtue of the tariff. It is admitted, however, that the sums are enormous. It is also impossible to determine how much North Dakota contributes to these monopolies, but it is safe to say that it bears its proportionate part of the burden. Perhaps the surest method of determining how much the trusts impose upon the people by virtue of the tariff is to notice the difference between the selling prices of certain articles in this country and in Europe which are produced at home and sold abroad. It has long been known that many American manufacturers were selling their goods cheaper in Europe than at home. The report of the Industrial commissioner of the United States (vol. XIX, p. 26) says: "In about 20 per cent of the cases covered by the commission returns the exported prices ruled lower than those charged to the home customers." It would be well to remember that this report was given 10 years ago when the famous "American invasion of the world" was but well under way. The exact amounts, however, of those discriminations will give a better idea of the effect the tariff has upon prices in the home market. The following is a list of prices at home and abroad of certain American-made goods, showing the per cent of the unfavorable differences. This list was prepared by Mr. Byron W. Holt, former editor of Moody's Magazine, and was published in 1896 by the committee on tariff reform of the Reform Club in New York City. His statistics are mainly taken from the Manufacturers' Expert and Home-Price Catalogues:

These facts and figures give some idea of the discriminations to which the American consumers are subjected at the hands of those manufacturers to whom they have given protection and prosperity. It should be remembered in this connection that our home manufacturers are selling at reduced prices stated above, after paying all the costs of transportation, and in many cases after paying the duties imposed by the foreign countries.

The farmers of North Dakota are consumers of every article contained in the list just given, and it is in this way, by paying these enormous differences to the home manufacturers, that they help maintain the tariff, and at the same time assist in creating those large fortunes that have become so large in recent years that their shadows reach round the world. It is in this way that North Dakota pays for that system of protection which does not protect, and maintains that barrier against a danger which does not exist. If we grant for the sake of argument that the duty on grains will enhance the price a few cents per bushel, still the difference which the people would realize would not pay the interest on the money which they annually pay out in order to maintain the system. But since the tariff fails to enhance the prices of the products of North Dakota both the principal and interest are lost—gone never to return. It is that much capital invested in a scheme which bears no profits; that much energy wasted; that much of a burden to obstruct and retard the progress and prosperity of the State. North Dakota gets all of the disadvantages of the tariff, but none of its advantages; bears all the burden, but receives none of its benefits; receives all of its injuries, but enjoys none of its fruits; gets all the harm, but none of its good; pays the price, but gets no return.

TARIFF ONE CAUSE OF HIGH LIVING.

But that is not all. Although at the present time the cost of living is exceedingly high, nevertheless as each day goes by it continues to ascend. Indeed, so high and so rapidly have the prices of the necessaries of life risen that not long ago Congress appointed a special committee to examine into its causes. Of course, the tariff is not the only cause for high prices. There are many causes, but there is no denying that it is one of the causes, and some would say the chief cause. There is, however, no dodging the fact that certain industries are absolutely controlled by a few private monopolies, that by virtue of the tariff they are able to impose high prices upon their commodities, and in that way extort illegitimate profits from the public. And as time goes on industry will become more thoroughly organized, corporations will become larger and stronger, the control of the home markets by the large combinations will become more complete, the tariff will be a more deadly weapon than ever before and will be used with greater effect in taking advantage of the necessities of the people.

North Dakota is now, and always has been, a prosperous and progressive State. Its people are energetic, enterprising, thrifty, and progressive. But it has prospered and progressed not because of the tariff, but in spite of it. Its broad prairies have given homes to thousands of people from every State in the Union; its virgin fields have given forth large returns; and in the fresh vigor of its youth it has marched forward, hardly noticing the mill stone around its neck. But some time in the future, when the population becomes more congested and the soil more exhausted, then North Dakota will discover that cause which helped her least and injured her most—the tariff.

LORIMER CASE.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I come now to the case before the Senate. I do not expect to be able to say anything new or throw any new light on the discussion of the facts of this case. Necessarily I must travel for the most part along the same line pursued by those who have preceded me. I have not thought it was necessary to consume any great amount of time in the discussion of this case. It seems to me that an hour or two would be ample for any one to draw out the salient facts in the case and discuss them as far as is necessary.

I shall not consume much time to-day, only just enough to state in concise form the principal grounds upon which I base my judgment. For some time I have had a fairly well-defined view as to the merits of this case, but hitherto I have refrained from giving expression to that view, because I desired to hear the case fully discussed before taking a final stand. I was all the more inclined to this course for the reason that illness and impaired strength, added to the press of various other duties, had made it almost impossible for me to examine the case with that thoroughness I would have liked and which it deserved. While I had devoted considerable time to the investigation of the more important phases of the case, I had not been able to examine all its details with that critical care which would warrant me in feeling that I was entirely familiar with all its features. I had looked through the testimony taken by the committee and had examined the briefs filed by attorneys, but I wanted to hear what learned Senators, who had made a more thorough and exhaustive investigation than I, might have to say on the one side and the other before I reached a final determination. I was anxious to form as intelligent an opinion as I am capable of respecting the merits of the case and to arrive at a conclusion upon which I could rely with sufficient confidence to justify me in acting upon it. My mind is now made up, and, as the case must be voted upon within a week if it is to be concluded at this session, I shall give voice to some of the reasons upon which my judgment is predicated.

Mr. President, I desire at the outset to say that I have arrived at my conclusion reluctantly and with regret. I regret, first, that I am compelled to disagree with the report of the committee. The majority of the committee who signed this report are among the ablest, most distinguished, and honorable Members of this body. I recognize their great abilities and have complete faith, as all their colleagues in the Senate have, in their absolute sincerity and in their high devotion to public duty. The one thing above all others that shakes my confidence in the correctness of my judgment is the fact that the Senators who made this committee report express the unhesitating opinion that Mr. LORIMER is entitled to retain his seat. Nevertheless, I feel reluctantly compelled by the force of my own judgment to put myself in opposition to their view. I regret, also, that I must take this position because of the personal regard I have entertained for the Senator from Illinois and because of his ability to perform useful public services here. It is exceedingly disagreeable that I feel obliged to take a position antagonistic to him in the grave emergency which he now confronts, but my conviction is so pronounced that no other alternative seems open to me.

Mr. President, before adverting to the testimony delivered under oath by witnesses, I desire to make some observations respecting party organization and the question of political morality involved in party loyalty.

I can not believe, as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE] believes, that we are upon the verge, the very dawn of the millennium. The shining gateway to that most happy land does not open to my shorter vision. I am going to refer to the political morality of these gentlemen for the reason that when I come to consider this case the initial fact which challenges my attention relates to Mr. LORIMER's personal part in the senatorial fight at Springfield. Mr. Hopkins had been duly and fairly nominated by the Republican voters of Illinois at a State primary for reelection to the seat he then held in the Senate of the United States.

He had been nominated over several opponents after an arduous contest, and the result had been generally acquiesced in. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], in the course of his very powerful address defending Mr. LORIMER's right to a seat, remarked, I think facetiously more than seriously, that if anything would justify Republicans bolting that nomination it was the fact that Hopkins was the nominee. Most of us know Mr. Hopkins personally, and I think it not improper to say that he is a gentleman of rather acrid temperament and with very dogmatic and aggressive characteristics. It may be that he was not overly popular among his former colleagues here, and that few of them would have been willing to play Jonathan to his David; and it may be that if it is true, as I suspect it is, that he is personally disliked by many people in Illinois, even of his own party. It is almost inevitable that a man of his irascible and somewhat vindictive disposition would have personal enemies. Why, sir, even gentlemen happily endowed with such patient, serene, and amiable dispositions as the junior Senator from Texas and myself have been known to have enemies in their States. Nevertheless, this may be said for Mr. Hopkins, that he is a man of good character and good abilities. He is also a sturdy Republican, a believer in the doctrines of his party, and one of its consistent and stalwart fighters. Having been duly and fairly nominated at an authorized primary election, concerning the regularity of which there was no question, he was entitled by every rule of fair politics to the support of every Republican member of the Illinois Legislature when that body came to elect a Senator. I am myself a consistent party man and believe in maintaining and standing by my party organization. I believe the struggle for party supremacy and for the enforcement of party policies in public administration is necessary to keep alive a keen interest among the people at large in public affairs, and I believe that parties are essential in an important sense to the preservation of our institutions. Therefore I believe in party organization and the maintenance of party discipline. Whenever we abandon this idea we open wide the door to party disintegration. Whenever there are several aspirants for the same position, if a political party hopes to win it must adopt some method for concentrating upon and selecting its party candidate. Necessarily this must be done by a primary election, a party convention, or a party caucus. Whenever a candidate is so selected I hold it to be the duty of every honorable adherent of that party and every advocate of its policies to accept the result, even though he may suffer a disappointment. No man can ordinarily bolt his party nomination without violating principles of good faith and political morality.

If parties are to be maintained, the voice of the majority must rule. Unless it is known that the candidate is guilty of conduct that makes him unworthy of public confidence, and that would make his occupancy of the office to which he aspires a menace to the public welfare, no party man is justified in refusing to obey the voice of the majority and support the candidate. Whenever I see a band of men conspiring to defeat a personally creditable nominee of their party, I at once become suspicious of something discreditable and sinister in their motives. Only some extraordinary reason will justify a bolt. A bolter is not only a disorganizer, but he is often a public enemy. And right here, Mr. President, I will take occasion to impress this thought by directing attention to some current examples. The States of New York and Montana have Democratic legislatures. A few months ago the people of those States renounced the Republican Party and by decisive majorities declared in favor of Democratic principles and policies. They did not mean to make a mere empty declaration when they cast their ballots. They meant to have a change in the Federal administration, and that the principles and policies represented by the Democratic Party should be applied, or at least have greater weight, in the practical administration of the Government. That was the verdict and the mandate of the people. But that verdict can not be made effective except through the agency of Democratic Senators and Representatives in Congress. When the people of those States elected Democrats to their legislatures they instructed them to elect Democrats to the Senate of the United States. Over in New York the Democrats of the legislature met in caucus, and a majority of the whole number of senators and representatives elected as Democrats voted in legislative caucus to nominate Mr. Sheehan, and he was nominated; and yet we have the pitiful spectacle of a minority, a comparatively small minority, standing out against their party associates and tying up the legislature for weeks and weeks by their unwarranted recalcitrancy. In Montana we have a spectacle even worse than that, if possible. A majority of the Democrats in the legislature of that State have voted and are still voting for Mr. Walsh, but a minority hold out against the majority and even refuse to go into a caucus to decide upon the party nominee. An almost similar situation exists in Colorado. Shall this go on until these legislatures adjourn without electing Senators? If so, then they pursue a course that not only tends to party disorganization, through the creation of embittered factions, but the bolters will be responsible for denying to their respective constituencies the right they won at the polls to be represented in the Senate by Democrats, and that, too, at a time when the presence of Democratic Senators from those States is tremendously important. What right have these men to permit their ambitions or dislikes to imperil so much and so many things of commanding importance? In a political sense, I look upon bolting as being little short of criminal, and I have no patience with men who are guilty of it—at least, no patience with Democrats who are guilty of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will excuse the Chair for one moment. The hour of 1.50 p. m. having arrived and the unfinished business being already before the Senate, the Chair does not think it necessary to again lay it before the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, WILLIAM LORIMER is a Republican. He has been repeatedly honored by the people of his State. He was not a candidate before the primaries for Senator. He did not cross swords with Hopkins and ask the voters of his party to choose between them. Instead of doing that he went to Springfield after the legislature assembled, and there organized a bolt among Republican Senators and Representatives against the election of Mr. Hopkins. I say he organized the bolt. If he did not, who did? Can there be a reasonable doubt that his was the master influence and force at work which organized that revolt and directed its operation? LORIMER did not like Hopkins. His business at Springfield, primarily at least, was to defeat the election of Hopkins; and he was there from the beginning of the fight to its ending. He was the general in command, pulling the strings and directing the force he had organized. All others were subordinate to him; they were but his lieutenants. His was the master mind, and his the dominating influence. Did he leave his seat in Congress and go to Springfield, and remain there for months counseling a course violative of party obligation, calculated to develop warring factions which tended to party disaster, if not to party disintegration, with no other idea than that of merely blocking Hopkins's return to the Senate? I can not but believe, Mr. President, that the real motive for his remarkable and certainly most unusual activities was not one of revenge so much as one that contemplated his personal promotion. I can not but believe that he was influenced far more by vaulting ambition than by any spirit of vindictiveness. If he did have locked up in his heart a secret or ulterior purpose, what was it? There can be but one answer to that question. That purpose must have been his own election to the Senate. The Scriptures teach us to judge a tree by its fruits. So must we judge men by their conduct and by the result of the things they deliberately do. It is said that the election was offered to Gov. Deneen. But if so, he declined to profit by party treachery, or to take honors at such a price. He put the temptation behind him, and LORIMER was elected. May not this alleged offer of the Senatorship to Deneen have been a part of the play? Let me quote from the testimony of Beckemeyer, given before the subcommittee:

Q. Was Gov. Deneen discussed as a candidate for United States Senator that the Democrats, or many of them, would vote for?—A. I don't think that very many of the Democrats at that time would have voted for Deneen.

Q. He was discussed among some of them, was he not?—A. I think probably he was.

There is other testimony to like effect. Was it known that such proffers would be rejected, or, if accepted, was it known they would not be carried out? In either event LORIMER's position would be strengthened and his own triumph made surer at the end. The refusal of others to enter the race would leave him standing out as the one man available and force a situation which would compel his election as the only solution of the problem. Mr. LORIMER walked through a maze of most complicated and confusing manipulation at Springfield, proving himself a master adept in politics, and came out at the end with a senatorial toga. He not only gathered a band of Republican legislators together, but he brought Democrats as well as Republicans into his combination, and together they wrought out his scheme. Shurtleff and Browne were LORIMER'S chief lieutenants and reported to him. These three were a trinity in a close and most confidential alliance. LORIMER and Shurtleff occupied the same rooms at the hotel, and there Browne visited them daily and nightly. There were no secrets between them and no reason for secrets, for the very necessities of the situation made the utmost frankness between all of them absolutely essential. When I behold LORIMER leaving his seat in the House of Representatives on his way to Springfield, and when I see him there at Springfield, a quiet, soft-spoken but forceful man, first gathering Republican senators and representatives about him and then seducing Democratic senators and representatives into his camp, and so welding these antagonistic forces as to make a harmonious body subject to his controlling will, I can not but admire the marvelous skill with which he accomplished his purpose. He was elected by bolters, bolters from both parties, and numerically divided almost evenly between them. The Lorimer Republicans bolted Hopkins and the Lorimer Democrats bolted Stringer, the regular nominee of their party. I have heard it said that these Democrats were justified in deserting Stringer, whose election they say was hopeless, and joining with bolting Republicans to defeat Hopkins, because, forsooth, Hopkins was the Republican nominee, and this because such a course, they say, was calculated to create factions and work harm to the Republican organization. It is claimed that that was legitimate political warfare. We are told that Abraham Lincoln advised his partisans to a like course on one occasion, and other instances are cited where legislators representing opposing parties united on a senatorial candidate. But the case of Lincoln and his followers and the case of Lee O'Neill Browne and his followers are not parallel. Lincoln during his candidacy was not a member of the legislature, upon whom the responsibility of legislative action was cast, but was only a candidate for the Senate, just as Stringer was a candidate for the Senate. Mr. Lincoln, realizing the hopelessness of his candidacy, withdrew himself from the contest and advised his followers to vote for Lyman Trumbull, who, for all intents and practical purposes, was a Republican. Lincoln's followers did not desert him or their party; they only followed his advice that they might elect a Senator whose views accorded with Mr. Lincoln's. But in this case Stringer did not withdraw from the contest. He stood his ground, never wavering and never advising or consenting that the men solemnly pledged and instructed to support him should desert even to another Democrat, much less to a Republican.

No, Mr. President, Lee O'Neil Browne can not shelter himself behind Abraham Lincoln's great name and excuse his desertion of Stringer, the Democrat, and his support of LORIMER, the Republican, by appealing to this episode in Lincoln's life as a precedent. But I will not longer stop to discuss the political ethics or morality involved in a desertion like that of which Browne was guilty, even in cases shorn of venality. Since, however, the alleged example of Abraham Lincoln has been cited to justify that course, I will take the liberty of quoting from another great Illinoisan on the same subject. But before making this quotation, and that it may be better understood, let me first say that the integrity of Salmon P. Chase's election to the Senate by the Ohio Legislature chosen in 1848 was at the time a subject of much controversy. Chase was elected by a combination of Democrats and Free Soilers. Among the Democrats were two men whose seats in the legislature were contested. They were necessary to Chase's election, and his friends in the legislature, as the result of an alleged bargain, voted to admit the two contested Democrats. Charles Sumner was elected to the Senate from Massachusetts in 1851, also by a combination of Democrats and Free Soilers—a combination which subsequently for several reasons was severely criticized throughout the country. On the 3d day of March, 1854, Stephen A. Douglas, the greatest of Illinois Senators, delivered a notable speech in the Senate during the celebrated debate on the Kansas-Nebraska bill. Replying to strictures made by Chase and Sumner on his motives, Senator Douglas said:

I must be permitted to tell the Senator from Ohio that I did not obtain my seat in this body either by a corrupt bargain or a dishonorable coalition. I must be permitted to remind the Senator from Massachusetts that I did not enter into any combinations or arrangements by which my character, my principles, and my honor were set up at public auction or private sale in order to procure a seat in the Senate of the United States. I did not come into the Senate by any such means. * * * The Senator from Massachusetts comes up with a very bold front and denies the right of any man to put him on defense for the manner of his election. * * * Everybody knows that he came here by a coalition or combination between political parties holding opposite and hostile opinions. But it is not my purpose to go into the morality of the matters involved in his election. The public know the history of that notorious coalition and have formed its judgment upon it. It will not do for the Senator to say that he was not a party to it, for he thereby betrays a consciousness of the immorality of the transaction without acquitting himself of the responsibilities which justly attach to him. As well might the receiver of stolen goods deny any responsibility for the larceny while luxuriating in the proceeds of the crime as the Senator to avoid the consequences resulting from the mode of his election while he clings to the office. I must be permitted to remind him of what he certainly can never forget, that when he arrived here to take his seat for the first time, so firmly were Senators impressed with the conviction that he had been elected by dishonorable and corrupt means, there were very few who, for a long time, could deem it consistent with personal honor to hold private intercourse with him. So general was that impression that for a long time he was avoided and shunned as a person unworthy of the association of gentlemen. Gradually, however, these injurious impressions were worn away by his bland manners and amiable deportment; and I regret that the Senator should now, by a violation of all the rules of courtesy and propriety, compel me to refresh his mind upon these unwelcome reminiscences.

Mr. President, I do not care to further discuss the political morality of such combinations, except to say that if I had been a member of the Illinois Legislature I would have been among those Democrats who remained steadfast in loyalty to Mr. Stringer. I would not have deserted my party standard to consort with the enemy as long as my leader stood his ground and my flag was unfurled. The wage of political sin is as deadly as the wages of other sins. If Lee O'Neil Browne had been honest and true, he would not have led his followers into a foul political mess which besmirched their names and scandalized their party.

Mr. President, I admit that the title of a Senator to his seat, whose election is untainted by actual fraud, can not be invalidated merely because his election was brought about by some combination of hostile political forces. Such an election may be the subject of a just criticism, but it will not invalidate the Senator's title to his seat. What I have said, therefore, about LORIMER and Browne and Shurtleff, and about their connection with the earlier phases of this wretched business, has been said that we might have a clearer insight into conditions preceding the election, and into the conduct and probable motives of men. Mr. LORIMER can not be deprived of his seat unless actual corruption is shown; nor even yet deprived, unless it is also further shown that his election was the result of that corruption, or that he had knowledge of it or sanctioned it.

Mr. President, was bribery employed in this senatorial election? That is the first question. Was White bribed? He confessed under oath that he was. He swore to it before grand juries, petit juries, and the Senate subcommittee. Did he tell the truth? Senators contend that he is a miserable liar and unworthy of belief; and undoubtedly, Mr. President, he is a most despicable character. He is both a Judas and a perjurer. He admits that he betrayed his State and party for money, and admits that he betrayed his friend—the man from whom he claims he received his bribe—for money. Unquestionably the unsupported testimony of such a man is not sufficient to convict anyone accused of any crime.

While the testimony of this creature must be received under grave suspicion and weighed with the greatest caution, still he is capable of speaking the truth; and we must not forget that ordinarily it is impossible to expose the crime of bribery except through the testimony of participating scoundrels. White is a reprobate, and therefore the very kind of man to recklessly use his crime for profit through extortion. If he received a bribe and wasted it in riotous living, he is the kind of man who would seek to retrieve financial distress by blackmailing his confederates, or by putting up his criminal information for sale to the highest bidder. Such a thing is not unprecedented. He did seek to blackmail both Browne and LORIMER. Browne gave him money and sought in other ways to serve him. Were Browne's favors bestowed through friendship or through fear? His patience in dealing with the fellow's exactions was exceedingly great. If White's story is true, then he held Browne at a disadvantage. If White's story is true, then Browne must have feared this wolf when he began to show his teeth. He cozened him with many endearing terms. He called him "dear friend," "dear Charley," "old pal," and by other tender and familiar appellations. Such endearments and favors were calculated to hold the creature in check, if not wholly lost to all sense of decency; but LORIMER was wiser than Browne. He was wise enough to know that one demand of the blackmailer would be followed by another, and that to yield would only result in further and deeper involvement. And so LORIMER suavely showed White the door and turned him down with gracious regrets. But White was not content with the pitiful pin money he got of Browne; he was playing for a larger stake. When LORIMER turned an obdurate face toward him, he sought another market for his wares. He sold his story to the Tribune. Naturally White's maneuvers were bruited about, and naturally, if there were guilty men, they would hunt shelter and seek defense against the coming storm.

All this was to be expected, if White told the truth. Neither LORIMER, nor Browne, nor any man whose name is associated with this alleged bribery, did anything that would surprise us, or anything that we would not have expected, if White told the truth. Everything they did when exposure was threatened, and after it came, were the very kind of things to be expected of them, if White told the truth. To be sure, Browne might have showered his endearments and favors on White, knowing him to be morally depraved, and LORIMER might have written White, as he did, blandly congratulating him on his flattering prospects as an author, when he knew from White's letter to him and from all the circumstances that White was trying to blackmail him—all this may have occurred and yet White's story be false and Browne and LORIMER as innocent as the angels. Certain it is that neither should be convicted on White's unsupported testimony. If there were no strongly corroborating facts and circumstances, LORIMER and Browne would stand instantly acquitted. Unfortunately for the men involved, White's story is strongly corroborated, both by positive testimony and by circumstantial facts. Mr. President, White is a knave of the deepest die, but still it must be admitted that he could tell the truth. And here let me ask, What object could White subserve, what advantage gain, by making a false charge of this kind and bolstering it up by perjury? Even bad men do not do serious things without a motive. If he did not himself receive a bribe, and if he knew absolutely nothing that could involve LORIMER, or Browne, or Beckemeyer, or Luke, or Link, or Wilson, or Clark, or Shephard, or any man in the meshes of dishonesty, what possible motive could have prompted him to commit a perjury so gross, and which inevitably would have been so utterly futile?

Would a man even of his caliber and character deliberately brand himself a perjurer and take all the hazards of his crime without a motive? To say so would be to write him down a lunatic and put him in a criminal class all alone and without a counterpart. If he had a motive, it was prompted by cupidity. But if the vice of avarice and the need of money were so great as to make him willing to commit such a crime against innocent and honest men, how could he hope to profit by it? If there had been no bribery, and therefore no creditable or possible proof of the crime, where could he have found a market for his perjury? The Chicago Tribune is LORIMER's inveterate enemy, but the manager of the Tribune is not a fool; and, however wicked his journal may be, he would not have dared to print an unmitigated lie like that, and thus impeach the official integrity of so many influential men. If Browne, Beckemeyer, and the others had been honest men, with clean records, they would have been fearless. They would have been as free from fear as Representative Groves, who drove the tempter, Douglas Patterson, from his room. They would have spurned the charge and prosecuted White for perjury and the Tribune for criminal libel, besides instituting civil suits for their vindication. No, no, Mr. President, White would have found a poor market for his story if it had been a lie out of the whole cloth. Still, I say, White must be corroborated, or we must hold guiltless every man accused. Let White be dismissed, therefore, and let us examine the supporting testimony.

Was Beckemeyer bribed? Was Link bribed? Was Luke bribed? Luke is dead, but Beckemeyer and Link are alive and were witnesses before the subcommittee. They were not willing witnesses, and the testimony shows that they uncovered their secrets with the greatest reluctance. Indeed, so unwilling were they to acknowledge their part in this foul transaction that they committed perjury by denying under oath before the grand jury that they had received corrupt money or had any knowledge that corrupt methods had been employed. And yet, in the end, driven by fear, they confessed to the receipt of money for things done by them as members of the legislature. Beckemeyer testified that he met Browne, on the latter's invitation, at St. Louis on June 21, 1909, a little more than two weeks after the adjournment of the legislature, and that Browne gave him $1,000, saying, "This is Lorimer money, and there will be some more in a few weeks."

Senator FRAZIER asked the witness if he understood that this $1,000 was paid to him in consequence of his voting for LORIMER, and he answered, "I could not possibly infer anything else."

Again, Beckemeyer testifies that he met Wilson, Browne's alter ego, in St. Louis on July 15, 1909, and then and there received an additional $900 from Wilson. Beckemeyer denied this when he first appeared before the Chicago grand jury. He started in to bluff it through, but when he learned he was likely to be indicted for perjury for denying even his presence in St. Louis at the time alleged he became panic-stricken and hurried back to the grand jury to correct his testimony, and thereafter confessed that he met both Browne and Wilson in St. Louis and received money from both. He was driven through base fear engendered by his conscious perjury to confess his crime. Did he tell the truth? If false, why would he tell such a lie? True, Beckemeyer testifies that while he talked with Browne shortly before LORIMER's election about voting for LORIMER, and talked with other members of the legislature about voting for LORIMER, some of whom said, "I am from Missouri, and have to be shown," yet he affirmed he never received an advance offer of money for his vote. It might be possible, strange as it may seem, that he voted for LORIMER without the hope or expectation of reward. He says that two nights before the day LORIMER was elected Browne talked with him about voting for LORIMER, and he told Browne he did not think he could do it, as it would ruin him politically at home. It may be that this man deserted his party standard, betrayed his party nominee, and faced an indignant constituency at home without a thought of any consideration for his sacrifice. It may be that although he received "Lorimer money" he did not expect to get it. Whatever Senators may think of that, it can not be denied that Beckemeyer says that he met Browne a few days after the adjournment—mark you, there was no time lost—and that Browne told him that within a week he would see him and give him a package; nor can it be denied that a few days later he actually did meet Browne in St. Louis on Browne's invitation—indeed, that fact is not denied—and Beckemeyer swears that Browne then gave him $1,000, saying it was Lorimer money. If all Beckemeyer says is true, by what token can we denounce White's story as false?

Michael Link testified that he met Browne on Browne's invitation in Browne's room in the Southern Hotel in St. Louis in the month of June, shortly after the adjournment, and that Browne handed him $1,000, saying, "Here is a package for you." He also testified that in July following this visit to Browne he went to St. Louis again on Wilson's invitation to meet Wilson; that he did meet Wilson in Wilson's room in the Southern Hotel, and that Wilson handed him $900, saying, "Here is a package." On this visit he swears he met Shephard, Clark, Luke, and White at the Southern Hotel. Oh, quite a lot of these carrion birds were gathered there. Link swore before the grand jury that he did not receive any money from Browne or Wilson, and denied that he ever met them in St. Louis. For swearing that he did not meet those men in St. Louis he was indicted for perjury. Like Beckemeyer he broke down under this indictment and the pressure upon him, admitted that he had lied, and not only confessed that he met Browne and Wilson in St. Louis, but also that he received money from both of them. Like Beckemeyer he swore that he did not receive any reward or promise of reward for his vote prior to LORIMER's election. He says he talked to LORIMER and personally pledged him his support because of LORIMER's attitude on the deep-water project. He says Browne approached him about voting for LORIMER, but he told him he was too late, as he had already promised LORIMER his vote.

Mr. President, I believe I will read a part of Link's testimony at this point. It is quite diverting, and fitly illustrates what a tangled web men weave when they attempt by ludicrous falsehoods to deceive:

Q. When you met Wilson in St. Louis, where did you meet him?—A. At the Southern Hotel.
Q. Can you give us the date, please?—A. No, sir.
Q. On your visit to see Wilson, whom did you see that belonged to or were members of the Illinois Legislature?—A. Mr. Shephard, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Luke (he is now dead), and White.
Q. Charles A. White?—A. I think his name is Charles, and Wilson, I believe Robert E. Wilson.
Q. Now, where did you meet Wilson in the Southern Hotel?—A. I presume it was his room, but I don't remember the number of the room or what room it was.
Q. It was a room in the Southern Hotel?—A. It was a room in the Southern Hotel.
Q. When you went in the room at the Southern Hotel, or while you were in a room at the Southern Hotel, were there some members of the Illinois Legislature present, whose names you have indicated to this committee?—A. They were not in the room all at one time, I don't think.
Q. Didn't you see all of them there in that room at the same time, or in there while you were in there?—A. I don't remember. I saw them there at the Southern Hotel that day.
Q. Did Wilson hand you anything?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. What?—A. A package.

Q. Did he say, "Here is a package?"—A. He said, "Here is a package."
Q. Did you ask him about it?—A. No, sir.
Q. Mr. Link, did you count the amount of money?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. How much was it?—A. Nine hundred dollars.
Q. Were you surprised when you got it?—A. No, sir.
Q. Did you consider you were getting campaign money?—A. Well, to be sure.
Q. You didn't consider you were getting anything else, did you, sir?—A. I had a right to consider it that way, if I saw fit, and that is the way I looked at it.
Q. Mr. Link, you didn't discuss the receipt of that $900, did you?—A. No, sir.

Q. What campaign did you have, or did you propose to have next after the month of June or July, 1909?—A. I expected to go back to the next legislature.

Q. When was the next legislature to convene or candidates therefor be nominated?—A. 1910.

Q. In what month?—A. In July.

Q. In July or August, was it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. 1910?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It didn't strike you as peculiar that Browne or Wilson on two separate occasions were going to contribute to your campaign expenses more than a year prior to your candidacy, did it?—A. I told you I was not surprised.

* * * * * * *

Q. Mr. Link, when you went before the grand jury the first time, did you tell them the truth or did you lie?—A. I kept saying I didn't remember until Wayman wrapped me around his finger.

Q. Did you testify that you had not been paid $1,000 by Browne, and that you had not received $500 from Wilson, or didn't you?—A. At that first interrogation, the question of Robert Wilson was discussed, but not the Browne $1,000.

Q. All right, then; the one they first interrogated you about when you went before the grand jury as to whether or not you had met Wilson in St. Louis?—A. I denied it.

Q. Was that true, or a falsehood?—A. I guess it was a falsehood; but I didn't remember of meeting him at that time, or didn't know the date.

Q. You stated you did not meet him at all, didn't you?—A. I stated afterwards that I did meet him.

Q. You stated afterwards you did meet him, but that was afterwards; after you had been indicted for perjury?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Link, did Mr. Wayman or any of his assistants or any officer at any time ask you to tell anything that was not true; yes, or no, please?—A. They asked me so many questions, that is a pretty hard question.

Q. Did anyone, at any time, ever ask you to tell a lie?—A. Not in that specific terms.

Q. Or in any other terms?—A. Not in that kind of terms.

Q. Did anyone, at any time, tell you to testify to any fact other than the truth?—A. Well, I had so many conversations with him, it is hard for me to answer just any remark, Senator.

Q. Tell me if anyone connected with the State's attorney's office, the State's attorney, his assistants, officers, employees asked you to lie?—A. They didn't ask me to lie.

Q. Now, after you were indicted for perjury, you were given the alternative of going before the grand jury and telling the truth, were you not, or be prosecuted for perjury?—A. I came before the grand jury to clear myself.

Q. And tell them the truth?—A. To clear myself.

Q. What do I understand by "clearing yourself?"—A. Telling them I had received some money.

Q. Hadn't you received some money?—A. Well, yes.

Q. You didn't tell the truth, did you, until you got the third-degree methods?—A. Yes; I did.

Q. I am asking you—you are the one that knows, not I.—A. Well, I suppose when I denied seeing Wilson when I did meet him.

Q. You denied, first, having any money?—A. There was no question asked about that. I said I didn't meet him.

Q. Didn't you deny getting any money from him?—A. I said I didn't meet him, and how could I get any money if I didn't meet him?

Q. Didn't you deny getting any money from him?—A. I don't remember.

Q. Didn't you deny getting any money from Browne?—A. That question was not asked me on the first occasion.

Q. Didn't you say before the grand jury that you didn't get any money from Browne, and didn't you say you got it after the third-degree methods?—A. The perjury charges was placed against me for simply saying I didn't meet Wilson.

Q. The perjury charge was correct, was it not?—A. Afterwards it proved it was; yes, sir.

Q. Didn't they give you a chance to go back before the grand jury and make a clean breast of it?—A. To save my life.

Q. Didn't they give you a chance to go back?—A. I didn't go back; I told them all I knew.

Q. You lied?—A. I don't know about that.

Q. Now, Mr. Link, you did go back before the grand jury?—A. I certainly did; on Saturday morning.

Q. You told the truth, and then they nollied the indictment for perjury against you; didn't they?—A. Yes, sir; after I answered those two questions.

Q. Mr. Wayman asked you to tell the truth, didn't he? Did he or didn't he; what is the answer?—A. That was about the Wilson affair, my subpœna here. I didn't care about that; I was asked to tell the truth whether I had met Bob Wilson.

Q. He interrogated you about the $900 and the $1,000?—A. That was afterwards; Mr. Wayman himself asked me those questions.

Q. He asked you to tell the truth?—A. He didn't ask me anything about telling the truth; I admitted that.

Q. When he talked with you; when Mr. Wayman first asked you whether or not you had received any money from Browne, you denied it, didn't you?—A. Yes; of course I did.

Q. When he asked you whether you had received any money from Wilson, you denied it?—A. That was not before the grand jury.

Q. At any time you denied it?—A. To be sure I did.

Q. Why, to be sure you did, what was in your mind that made you deny it?—A. Because I didn't want to get any third-degree methods up here.

Q. You thought that might involve you in the third-degree methods?—A. No, sir; I didn't know anything about that.

Q. When you went before the grand jury subsequently you told them you got $1,000 from Browne?—A. I answered two questions.

Q. Will you please answer my question?—A. I answered two questions: One was that I got $1,000 from Browne, and the other was that I got $900 from Wilson.

Q. In St. Louis?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You had denied it up to that time. Did you protest and object when the officer went with you to your home?—A. I didn't have knowledge of the law enough. No; I did not. I got tired of it mighty quick.

Senator FRAZIER. If it were true that you met Wilson at St. Louis and he paid you $900, and that you met Browne and he paid you $1,000, why didn't you tell that when you came up here before the grand jury and before Mr. Wayman? What were you concealing it for?—A. I didn't want to get myself, perhaps, in trouble and my friends in trouble. I didn't know where the money came from. That was the only reason.

Q. Why didn't you tell it if it were a fact that you got it, and that you met those gentlemen? What were you trying to conceal it for? What was there wrong about the transaction?—A. I didn't know anything about what there was about it. And I didn't desire to criminate myself for taking this money. I didn't know where it came from.

Q. If it were a present to you, and a fair and honest transaction for campaign purposes, or a gift or otherwise, why were you trying to conceal it?—A. I had no reason at all for concealing it.

Q. Why didn't you tell it?—A. Pardon me, I will correct that. I was afraid of getting somebody into trouble; I didn't know where this money came from.

Q. Who were you afraid of getting into trouble?—A. Friends of mine or myself.

Q. Who were your friends?—A. I had a great many friends on the Republican side and on the Democratic side in the general assembly.

Q. How would you get your friends into trouble by telling the truth, if this were a perfectly honest and legitimate transaction?—A. I didn't know how it would get them into trouble, only it struck me I might get them into trouble.

Q. You didn't care to admit that some one had given you $1,000 without any explantion about it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was there anything said by you or Browne at the time he gave you this money as to why he was giving you this $1,000?—A. No, sir; I just supposed it was campaign money; but where it came from I didn't ask him.

Q. You supposed it was what?—A. For campaign purposes or something of that kind.

Q. What sort of campaign purposes?—A. Down in Madison County; it costs a good deal to be elected there.

Q. Had Browne ever contributed to your campaign when you were a real candidate?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Had anybody else ever contributed to your campaign when you were a candidate?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. You were not a candidate at that time?—A. I certainly was.

Q. You were a candidate for the next time.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had you ever asked Browne for any money for your campaign?—A. No, sir.

Q. You had not?—A. No, sir.

Q. You hadn't suggested to him that you needed any money for your campaign?—A. No, sir; I might have told him—I did have several talks with him—that I was going to have a terrible hard pull to get back.

Q. Did you suggest to him that you were glad to get that money and you would use it in your campaign?—A. I didn't say anything about what I would do with the money.

Q. You didn't say a word about that?—A. No, sir.

Q. As to where it came from or anything about it?—A. No, sir.

Q. You didn't ask him why he gave it to you?—A. No, sir; I didn't ask any questions.

Q. He simply gave you $1,000 and you counted it and saw it was $1,000 and put it in your pocket and went away?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He made no explanations to you and you asked no questions?—A. No, sir.

Q. You kept it and used for your own benefit?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you met Wilson in St. Louis, was that in response to a letter?—A. Some kind of a communication.

Q. Now, when he gave you the $900, did he tell you why he was giving you the $900?—A. No, sir; and I didn't know where it came from.

Q. You didn't ask any questions?—A. No, sir.

Q. Didn't it rather strike you as an extraordinary sort of thing that a gentleman would give you $1,000 with no explanation, and the other $900 with no sort of an explanation?—A. I didn't know what source or what business contributed a nickel of that money at all; never was in any consultation to know where he got this much or that, and how would I know about it?

Q. Were you surprised when you took the $900?—A. Not very much.

Q. Why weren't you surprised?—A. I was glad to get it.

Q. Did anyone in your life ever give you $1,000 without asking you any questions or making any explanation?—A. No; I don't know as they did.

Q. Why was not this an extraordinary sort of thing, then?—A. If he saw fit to give me a present for campaign purposes, I was glad to receive it and ask no questions.

Q. You were not surprised that he did?—A. None whatever, sir.

Q. You had never had anybody give you $1,000 before in your life or $900?—A. Not directly.

Q. We want to get at the whole transaction, Mr. Link, and we are trying to get at the truth about it.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And we would like to know if at any time there was any reason or any cause why these men should have given you $1,000 and $900. Did they owe you anything or have any transaction between you or business or anything?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Did any other member of the legislature ever give you $1,000 or $900?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or any other man in your history as a politician or statesman in this State, did anybody else ever give you $1,000 or $900?—A. No, sir.

Q. Just on these two occasions. You didn't ask any questions?—A. I didn't ask any questions, and there were no answers given to me or no reasons given to me.

Q. Had you had any information, directly or indirectly, as to any gathering up of funds to be distributed among legislators for votes?—A. No, sir; no direct information.

Q. Had you had any indirect information?—A. It was rumored those things; I don't know whether they did or not.

Q. You had heard rumors of that sort?—A. Yes, sir; but nothing accurately or definitely.

Q. Did Browne, when he handed you the $1,000, say anything about your voting for LORIMER?—A. No, sir; he did not.

Q. Just tell us exactly what he said, if he said anything?—A. We talked casually about——

Q. (Interrupting.) Tell us exactly what he said.—A. I don't remember; he was going back to the next legislature, and so was I if I could; that was the conversation, so far as I could remember.

Q. When you first went into his room was there anyone in there?—A. Not to my knowledge; I think he was by himself.

Q. When he handed you the package, was it in an envelope or wrapped up in some form?—A. I think it was just in separate bills.

Q. He just handed you out the money?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he count it or did you count it?—A. I counted it.

Q. He handed you a package of bills and you counted it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When he handed you the thousand-dollar package of bills, did he say anything to you?—A. He said, "This is coming to you." Nothing else was said as to the purpose.

Q. He just said, "This is coming to you?"—A. Something of that nature. I don't remember exactly; of course he was not dumb when he handed it to me.

Q. That is what we want to find out.—A. I don't remember the exact conversation, only he said, "This is a present" or "This is coming to you."

Q. Which did he say, "This is coming to you" or "This is a present"?—A. I don't remember; it was something of that kind.

Q. You can't recall that?—A. No, sir.

Q. What did you reply?—A. I says, "All right, Lee." That is all that was said in relation to it.

Q. You counted the $1,000?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he say it was $1,000, or did he just hand you the package and say it was coming to you?—A. I don't remember whether he used the word "thousand" or not. Not much was said in the conversation at all.

* * * * * * *

Q. When you met Wilson and he gave you $900, will you just state what he said when he handed you the $900?—A. Something similar to what Browne said, "This is coming to you," or "This is for you, Mike." "This is for you."

Q. Did you ask him what it was given to you for?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see anyone else in his room during that time?—A. At that specific time I don't recollect, but I mentioned the different gentlemen that I saw there.

Q. Was there anyone else in there at the time he gave you the package of money?—A. I don't remember whether there was or not; I don't think there was, though.

Q. But did you see other gentlemen come in during the——A. (Interrupting.) No conversation was had, I was with Mr. Wilson quite a little while that day.

Q. Did you see these gentlemen—members of the legislature—Mr. Luke——. A. Yes, sir; during the time.

Q. Shephard and Clark?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And Mr. White. Those were all members of the legislature?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. They were in his room during your visit?—A. During the time of my call there some time, but I can't say just exactly.

Q. They were all members of the legislature who had voted for Mr. LORIMER, were they not?—A. I think every one of them had voted for Mr. LORIMER.

Q. Did you see any other member of the legislature there that day?—A. Not to my knowledge; no, I did not; I am quite certain.

Q. You saw Shephard, Clark, Luke, and White?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In Wilson's room?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You don't recollect any others?—A. Not now; no, sir; I do not.

Senator BURROWS. When you got the $1,000 you say you didn't know what it was for; did you count it?—A. I don't remember whether I counted it there at that time. I did afterwards.

Q. Why did you count it?—A. To know whether there was a—how much money there was in the package.

Q. That was all?—A. Certainly; I wanted to know how much the present was worth. I wanted to know just what it was worth.

Q. You had no other purpose in counting it?—A. No, sir; none whatever.

What part of this testimony should be credited and what discredited each Senator must judge. One thing this testimony does make perfectly plain, and that is that Link met Browne and Wilson in St. Louis and received money from both. He at first denied these facts before the grand jury, but now admits he then swore falsely. He now acknowledges the receipt of the money, but still insists he does not know for what purpose these large sums were given to him. That part of his testimony is wholly improbable and unreasonable. When he says he had no idea for what purpose Browne and Wilson summoned him to St. Louis you know he lies. When he says he received this money from them without the faintest idea for what purpose it was given, and that he accepted it without asking for any explanation and without any explanation whatever being offered, you know he lies. When he says he thought the two payments were two presents, or possibly two contributions to his campaign for reelection, 15 or 18 months away, you know he lies. That story is too utterly ludicrous for any unprejudiced mind to give to it the slightest credence. It may be asked why he would admit receiving this money and yet deny all knowledge of the purpose or reason for which it was given and deny all knowledge or even suspicion of the source from which it came. I think this performance, asinine as it is, is not difficult to understand. Link knows that bribery is a felony, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, and he knows that bribery is an odious crime and that a public official guilty of it must wear forever upon his brow the brand of infamy. He feared to confess bribery and face the courts or his constituents. He shrank cowering from a confession that he accepted a bribe for official work, and, hard driven, resorted to the silly device of saying he regarded the money as presents from generous friends or as contributions to a far-off campaign. The mental operations of the man are not difficult to comprehend. Mr. President, with Link's story before our eyes, is it difficult to believe the story of White?

Luke is dead. But Luke was one of the traitorous Democrats who voted for LORIMER. He was also one of that delectable company invited to Wilson's pay-day feast at the Southern Hotel. His wife saw, so she testified, the dispatch inviting him to attend, and there is abundant proof that he did attend. She testified that on one occasion after his return home from some unknown place—that is, some place unknown to her, and he did not disclose where he had been—but on returning he exhibited a large sum of money, she thought $950. True, she says, this was before he went to St. Louis to meet Wilson, but when he went or where he went she did not know. This sweet-scented Wilson convention at St. Louis was held on the 15th day of July, and Browne's convention was about the middle of June. It is important just here to keep these dates in mind. Browne was in St. Louis in June and Wilson in July. Mrs. Luke stated that it was after Luke's return home following the adjournment on June 4, and between that time and his visit to Wilson in St. Louis on July 15 that her husband went away on some mysterious journey and came back with this large sum of money. Did he go away in June to meet Browne? Can there be any reasonable doubt of that? All these occurrences were within the compass of a few weeks. Naturally, Mrs. Luke, poor woman, would shield the memory of her husband as far as possible. No doubt she sought to tell the truth, and there is no occasion for denying that she did. But did Luke see Browne before he saw Wilson?, He went to St. Louis on Wilson's invitation to meet Wilson, just as the others did. If Wilson gave White, Beckemeyer, and Link $900 each on that occasion, can you doubt that he gave Luke the same amount? And if Luke got money from Wilson, can you doubt that he also received money from Browne? If he shared in the spoil Wilson distributed for Browne, can you doubt that he shared in that distributed by Browne himself? Mr. President, the accusing circumstances all point in the same direction. They are overwhelmingly convincing that Luke was one of Browne's band of criminals. Do not these circumstances involving Luke, and the reasonable inferences to be deduced therefrom, tend strongly to corroborate and support the original story of White?

I come now to Senator Holstlaw—or rather to Senators Holstlaw and Broderick. They are so inseparably connected that we can not speak of one without speaking of the other. Driven as the others were by the fear of criminal prosecutions, Holstlaw confessed to the promise of a reward if he voted for LORIMER, and that after he had voted for LORIMER he received $2,500 at one time, and $700 at another time. He testifies that on the night preceding LORIMER's election he had a talk with his colleague, Senator Broderick, in which both expressed the opinion that LORIMER would probably be elected on the following day, and Holstlaw swears that Broderick said this to him, "Well, there is $2,500 for you," or, "There is $2,500 for you if you vote for him." Holstlaw understood, as he must inevitably have understood, from Broderick that he would receive $2,500 if he cast his vote for LORIMER. And Broderick beyond all reasonable doubt intended by what he said to offer Holstlaw this tempting bribe. I say this because a few days after the legislature adjourned Broderick wrote Holstlaw to come to see him in Chicago, and Holstlaw went to Chicago in response to that letter and visited Broderick at his saloon on June 16, 12 days after the dissolution of the legislature. Several weeks after that he went to see Broderick again at the same place. Holstlaw testifies that these were the only two occasions he ever visited Broderick or ever entered his saloon. On his first visit, June 16, Broderick escorted him into his private room and there handed him $2,500 in cash. On Holstlaw's second visit Broderick gave him $700 additional. Holstlaw says that he took the money when offered, and says that Broderick remarked as he handed him the $2,500, "Here is that money." According to Holstlaw's testimony that was the whole conversation—"Here is that money." What money? Why, that money. No explanation was asked or given as to where the money came from or for what purpose it was paid, and none was necessary. Broderick was not indebted to Holstlaw, they had never had a business transaction, and this was Holstlaw's first visit to Broderick. Holstlaw was asked:

What did he pay you the $2,500 for?

And he answered:

I supposed he was paying it to me because he had told me that he would give it to me after my having said I was going to vote for LORIMER, and I supposed that he paid it to me for that.

Again, he was asked if Broderick in his letter inviting him to Chicago indicated for what purpose he desired to see him, and Holstlaw answered:

Well, Mr. Broderick told me that he would give me the $2,500.

True, Holstlaw would have the subcommittee and the Senate believe that his vote was not bought or influenced by any prospect of reward. In this particular his attitude is like that assumed by Link and Beckemeyer, and, no doubt, for the same reasons. But if Holstlaw's testimony as to his conversation with Broderick the night before the senatorial election and as to the subsequent receipt of the money is to be believed, then, notwithstanding his belated profession of virtuous intention, we have a clear case of an offer to bribe and the subsequent payment of the bribe money. If Holstlaw is to be believed, we have a clear case of bribery, and bribery committed for the direct and confessed purpose of promoting Mr. LORIMER's election. Did Holstlaw tell the truth? In answering that question I will say, first, that there was an utter absence of any motive for Holtslaw to tell a lie. There is an utter absence of any motive for Holtslaw desiring or consenting to do either LORIMER or Broderick so foul a wrong as to falsely swear that Broderick offered and paid him money to vote for LORIMER. And I will say, secondly, that there is one circumstance that seems to put the fact of Holstlaw's receipt of the $2,500 beyond all reasonable doubt. That fact is that on the very day he received the money, June 16, he deposited it in the State Bank of Chicago.

Recognizing the damaging force of this circumstance the friends of Senator LORIMER have denied or sought to discredit the statement that Holstlaw made the deposit to which he testified; but, Mr. President, Holstlaw was corroborated in this behalf by the chief clerk of the bank, Jarvis O. Newton, who swore he received the deposit and made out the deposit slip which he gave to Holstlaw. The testimony Newton gave relating to this deposit was so furiously assailed, and charges so seriously affecting the integrity of the bank officials and the truth of Newton's testimony were made, that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] procured the original deposit slip attached to an affidavit made by Newton, in which he identified the deposit slip as the one he had made and delivered to Holstlaw. This original deposit slip and the affidavit of Mr. Newton were exhibited to numerous Senators here on the floor, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] among them. That Senator, on comparing the handwriting of the slip with Newton's signature to the affidavit, declared it to be his deliberate opinion that the two did not correspond and that the deposit slip was a forgery. I examined the same papers, and, although I do not claim to be a handwriting expert, I do not hesitate to say, with all due deference to the Senator from Texas, that to me the writing on the two papers is so strikingly similar that I have no doubt that the man who signed the affidavit wrote the slip. I can not at all agree with the Senator from Texas in this particular. Mr. President, why should this bank officer wantonly commit a forgery of this kind, and then appear before the Senate committee and commit perjury to bolster up the forgery? To my thinking that is wholly improbable, for there is an utter absence of motive for doing such a monstrous thing, and I was astounded at the bold attacks made by Senators on this unoffending man. If the committee had the least doubt or suspicion that Holstlaw and Newton had sworn falsely as to this deposit they could have summoned the bookkeeper, the cashier, and other officials of the bank, and compelled them to produce their books to show whether this sum had been charged in the cash receipts and credited to the account of Holstlaw on the particular day named by the witness. But the committee had no doubt as to the veracity of Newton's statement. Can it be imagined that the executive officers of a responsible institution like this bank would commit or sanction such perjury or forgery, or would tolerate any false entry on their books?

Why, sir, there could be no possible motive for such an act, and aside from every other consideration the exposure of such a crime would have destroyed the bank. If the books of the bank show that that deposit was made, then it was made at the time Holstlaw and Newton stated. Moreover, if that deposit appears on the books of the bank then the deposit was actual and not fictitious. You can not believe that the bank would give Holstlaw a credit for $2,500 without receiving the money or its equivalent. Further still, if Holstlaw deposited that money as he stated, he received it from Broderick as he stated. If not from Broderick, from whom did he get it? Do you suppose he carried this $2,500 in cash from his home to Chicago that he might deposit it there and make it a basis of some false charge against Broderick? It seems to me that all talk and surmising of this kind are too absolutely absurd to deserve attention. It is true Broderick denies the conversation with Holstlaw on the night preceding LORIMER's election, and denies that he paid to Holstlaw any money at any time. He did not deny, however, that he had written to Holstlaw to come to Chicago to see him, as Holstlaw had testified he did, although Holstlaw had never visited him before. He would not say whether he had written such a letter as Holstlaw said he received. He declined to deny that, for he could not tell but that Holstlaw might produce the letter. If you will read Broderick's testimony you will observe that he refused on several occasions to answer pointed questions, giving as a reason for his refusal that he could not be compelled to give testimony against himself, or testimony that might be self-incriminating. If Broderick were a truthful and honest man, why the necessity of sheltering himself behind this privilege and claiming this exemption? Mr. President, taking an impartial and unprejudiced view of all the facts and circumstances it is to my mind perfectly plain, almost indisputably so, that Holstlaw testified to the truth about his conversation with Broderick and about receiving the money. If Broderick told Holstlaw the night before LORIMER's election that he would get $2,500 if he voted for LORIMER, from whom did Broderick expect that money to come? If Broderick gave $2,500 to Holstlaw on one occasion and $700 on another, where did he get the money? Do you suppose, Mr. President and Senators, that this saloonkeeper gave Holstlaw $3,200 of his own money? In your hearing on Wednesday last Mr. LORIMER described Broderick as his bosom friend; still Broderick would not likely pay Holstlaw $3,200 out of his own pocket without any consideration therefor. He swore he made Holstlaw no promise, and therefore was under no sort of obligation to him. If that be true, do you suppose that he so loved the junior Senator from Illinois and was so elated over his success, that, bubbling over with joy, he delved into his own pocket, fished out $3,200 of his own money, and made a jollification gift of that large sum to his senatorial colleague? Yes, sir; Holstlaw's story bears all the earmarks of truth, and if it be true, what good reason have we for denouncing White's story as false?

Mr. President, let me recur to the Browne convocation in St. Louis in June, 1909, that I may propound this question to the Senate: Was the money Browne paid to Beckemeyer, Link, and others bribe money? I do not hesitate to say this, that whether this money, or any part of it, was paid for LORIMER votes or not, beyond all peradventure it was corrupt money, used in some corrupt transaction. Browne and Wilson, of course, deny that they paid any money to any man on the occasions stated. But can you, in the known circumstances of this case, give credit to their oaths? For what purpose were these men assembled at the call of Browne and Wilson in St. Louis? If the mission there was a proper and honest one, why was there so much secrecy about it; and, after the fear of exposure came, why did the participants in those meetings go scurrying about seeking to improvise some defense against the threatened danger? Why did Wilson, in May, 1910, after consulting with his stampeded associates, send out letters to them, dated back to the year before—back to June 26, 1909—inviting them to meet him in St. Louis to discuss the question of giving Browne a banquet? Were they trying to hedge? Why was this posthumous story concocted? Manifestly because they saw the necessity of manufacturing some excuse for that St. Louis meeting. Therefore this letter was written and dated back a year so as to lay a plausible foundation for a contemplated lie. Does not that look as if those men were criminals, fleeing from the wrath to come? If these were honest men, and if the St. Louis meeting was for an honest purpose, there was no need of involving it in mystery, and no need to commit perjury by denying that the meeting was held. There was no need for all that unless these meetings in St. Louis were the culminating acts in a monstrous conspiracy against the honor of a great State. If innocent, every man among them would have scorned the base charge White preferred, and, without a moment's waiting, volunteered the whole truth and sought the vindication of their good names before the courts of the country. But the skulking manner characterizing their every movement, their utter insincerity, their repeated deliberate perjury, all combine to prove them a band of scheming rascals instead of a company of honorable gentlemen. Mr. President, how can you escape the conviction that Browne paid out thousands of dollars to these men? Wilson was merely an agent of Browne, and Browne supplied him with the money he distributed. Where did Browne get this money? Do you imagine for a moment—is it within the range of human probability—that Browne paid all these thousands out of his own personal funds? The very suggestion of that is preposterous. Rather might I ask if there can be a doubt that Browne not only received the money he distributed from some vitally interested source, but that he himself took care to feather his own nest in the interim? Is it reasonable to say that Browne would take the hazard of bribing men without himself receiving some personal emolument?

Mr. President, do the circumstances of the case connect Senator LORIMER with this bribery, and are they sufficient to convince us that he must have had knowledge, some well-grounded intimation at least, as to what was in the air? Remember, sir, his close, confidential relationship with Browne. He seduced Browne from his allegiance to Stringer and made him his right arm in the battle he waged for the senatorship. I know Senator LORIMER denies this. In his last speech he would have the Senate believe that Browne was forced by his followers to the Senator's support. But no man can read this testimony without seeing that Browne was the one chief, potential force above all others among Democrats, and whose ceaseless activities were most continuously exerted to beguile Democratic votes to LORIMER's standard; and the testimony shows beyond all intelligent dispute that LORIMER depended upon Browne above any and all other Democrats. Their consultations for weeks ran through both days and nights, and their confidences were many and very close. In fact, I would be almost justified in saying that this relation was so close and of such a character that Browne might well be regarded as LORIMER's commissioned agent authorized to employ whatever means he might deem necessary or advisable to bring his followers into line. Under these circumstances does it seem probable that Browne would discuss money considerations with his followers, make promises and afterwards keep them, with utter ignorance on LORIMER's part as to what was being done? LORIMER was in command, and he was to be the beneficiary of the contest. Can LORIMER's lieutenants be guilty of these crimes and yet LORIMER himself, the beneficiary, be wholly innocent? The question "Who furnished the money?" like Banquo's ghost, will not down.

Mr. President, I might go on and consume much time discussing other men and other circumstances connected with this transaction—evidence tending to show a wide range of corruption, and tending to corroborate the story White sold to the Chicago Tribune. I might, for example, discuss the significance of Clark's and Shephard's presence in St. Louis, when White, Beckemeyer, and Link were there to receive money from Browne or Wilson. Clark and Shephard went to St. Louis on the same kind of invitation which carried the others there, and it seems impossible that they attended either of those particular meetings on a different mission. They were there in the same room with Link and White—the same room in which Wilson distributed his corruption fund. What were they there for? Wilson took Shephard into the bathroom. What for? Listen to Shephard's answer to that as he gave it under oath to the subcommittee:

Q. Why did Bob Wilson take you into the bathroom on the 21st of July?—A. I don't know; he took me in there to ask me a question. I will tell you the question if you want to know what it is. He asked me who the lady was he saw me with in the St. Nicholas Hotel in Springfield.
Q. Neither of you being married, that question was so confidential that you had to be taken by him into the bathroom so that he could ask you privately?—A. I don't know what prompted him to do it; I can't say as to that
Q. Did he close the door?—A. I can't say as to that.
Q. Will you say he did not close the door?—A. I am not sure whether he did or not. I can't remember.
Q. Were you the least bit surprised that he should take you out of the main room and into the bathroom and close the door or not close the door, whichever it was, just to ask you who the lady was that you, an unmarried man, had with you in Springfield?—A. I was not surprised at all. I did not think of it. When I told him who it was he said, "I thought it was somebody else."
Q. Were you with this young lady in Springfield when Wilson saw you?—A. At the St. Nicholas Hotel, at the dinner table.
Q. There was no secret about it?—A. No, sir.
Q. It was a relative of yours?—A. Yes, sir; she is my sister-in-law.
Q. And you were all in public?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. At a public hotel, dining with her?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. And a great many other people saw you besides Wilson?—A. Yes, sir; I presume they did.
Q. And just to inquire as to who the name of the young lady was—you having been seen with her in public in the St. Nicholas Hotel—he took you into the bathroom?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. And that is all he asked?—A. That is the only question he asked me there and the only conversation we had there; yes, sir.

Senators, do you believe that to be a reasonable story? What was there about a member of the legislature dining with a lady in the public dining room of a prominent hotel that made it necessary for Browne to employ such secretive tactics to ascertain her identity? And yet these two men, Shephard and Wilson, had the audacity to swear to that absurdity as a fact. No, no; Wilson did not invite Shephard into his bathroom for any such idle, albeit sentimental, purpose.

Again, listen to what Shephard said about meeting Browne in St. Louis:

Senator FRAZIER. What did Mr. Browne want of you when he wrote you to meet him in St. Louis?—A. I don't know, sir. He just simply said in the letter or telegram, whatever it was: "Will be in St. Louis at Southern Hotel" at a certain date, "and if convenient will be glad to see you."
Q. When you saw him did he make any explanation of what he wanted or why he had written?—A. No, sir; I suppose it was just a visit. Mr. Browne and I were very good friends during the session, and he knew I went to St. Louis very frequently, as I do—I go down there nearly every week, maybe twice a week.
Q. He made no explanation to you as to why he wanted to see you?—A. No.
Q. You did not talk politics?—A. We may have talked some politics there in the room. I can't recall what the conversation was there.

Mr. President, I submit that that story, under all the facts and circumstances of which we have been advised, is wholly incredulous. But I forbear to further consume the valuable time of the Senate by pursuing this phase of the controversy.

Mr. President, that there was talk of bribery and efforts to bribe during the senatorial contest is made evident by the testimony of witnesses, members of the legislature who did not vote for LORIMER, as well as by the testimony of those who did vote for him. I refer to such men as Terrill and Groves. These men stand unimpeached, and no charge of dishonorable conduct can be fairly laid at their door. Perhaps in saying this I ought to except the assault made upon Groves and Terrill by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. With due respect, and certainly without meaning in the least to offend, I am bound to say that in assailing these men my distinguished and eloquent friend from Texas gave to his zeal and to his imagination too free a rein. What are the facts? Groves was twice called to the stand by the committee. On his first appearance he was reported by the stenographer as saying that Terrill told him that he had received a thousand dollars for voting for LORIMER. That is the way the testimony appeared in the record. Later he was recalled, at his own request, to correct that statement and did correct it. He declared that he did not say on his first appearance that Terrill told him he actually got a thousand dollars for voting for LORIMER, but that Terrill said that he had been told there was a thousand dollars in sight if he would vote for LORIMER. This is all the Senator from Texas quoted, and thereupon he proceeded to speak with exceeding harshness of Groves. But let me read what immediately follows Groves's correction of that part of the record quoted by the Senator, and thus prove that Groves was both fair and honest:

Mr. AUSTRIAN. The witness notified me that he desired to correct that statement.

That is, the statement that Terrill told him that he received $1,000 for voting for LORIMER. Then this follows:

Senator PAYNTER. Yes; I didn't understand him to say that, anyway.
Mr. AUSTRIAN. That is the way the record reads. I didn't understand it, either, but that is the way the record reads.

So you will observe, Mr. President, that Groves did not swear that Terrill said he had received money for voting for LORIMER. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER] agreed with Mr. Groves, that the fault was not with Groves, but with the record. The Senator from Kentucky said, "I did not understand him to say that, anyway." Surely that ought to settle it. I think the Senator from Texas must have overlooked what I have quoted, for I am sure he would not do Mr. Groves an intentional injustice. I am sure he would not have sought to discredit Groves in the way he did if he had had the part of the record I have quoted in mind at the time. Terrill himself said that a member by the name of Griffin, from Cook County, asked him to vote for LORIMER, and, being curious to know what was in the wind, he asked Griffin what there was in it, and Griffin answered, "A thousand dollars, anyway." And right here it is not amiss to call attention to the fact that Griffin was the Democratic member whose vote "Hinky Dink," the celebrated Chicago politician, pledged to LORIMER. Griffin is the man Terrill swears told him that there was $1,000, anyway, in voting for LORIMER. It seems, Mr. President, that "a thousand dollars" was the standard market price for votes at Springfield at that time for members of the lower house. There is considerable testimony of this kind running through this voluminous record, but I will keep my promise, and forbear to follow it in detail. And so I will leave my discussion of the testimony at this point.

Mr. President, in the face of what Beckemeyer, Holtslaw, and others, whose evidence has been quoted, testified to; in the face of all the damaging and damning facts developed by both positive and circumstantial testimony, and in the face of all that appears in this most accusing record, Senator LORIMER sat silent as the dead. He had no explanation to make; no word to say. Why did not Mr. LORIMER take the witness stand, speak out like a man who had naught to fear, answer any question propounded to him, and tell everything he knew about the case? Does this attitude of silence comport with innocence? If it was shown that Beckemeyer, Holtslaw, and White had received money for their votes, if it was shown that other legislators had also been the recipients of corrupt money, and if it was shown that still others had been approached with corrupt overtures, did not this volume of inculpating testimony shift the burden of proof on Mr. LORIMER and make it imperative that he should defend his title?

I ask again, if Browne paid this money to Holstlaw, Beckemeyer, and the others in the way they alleged, is it within the scope of things probable that Browne alone was guilty of offending against law and public decency, and that LORIMER wended his tortuous way through the maze, always the dominating and directing influence, without a stain? I will not contend, for it is unnecessary, that Browne was LORIMER's agent in the sense that LORIMER was bound by all his acts. It is unnecessary to apply the legal maxim qui facit per alium facit per se—he who acts through another acts himself. I do not invoke the rule which governs the relation between principal and agent. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case that we try it by the testimony, unswerved by sentiment and unmoved by passion. It is sufficient if the facts brought home to the Senate convince you that want of knowledge on the part of Mr. LORIMER is wholly improbable. We must judge of Mr. LORIMER's knowledge on probabilities—on probabilities that leave no room for reasonable doubt. I hold that it was incumbent upon him, and if innocent it was a duty he owed to himself, to answer before the committee. If innocent, he should have taken the stand and frankly stated all he knew and submitted himself to the most rigid interrogation, purged his election of taint, and thus defended his title. He made no attempt to defend himself under the sanctity of an oath, but preferred to remain silent while the investigation was in progress and come here to defend himself in a speech before the Senate. He should not have waited to make his defense as an orator or an advocate, pleading his own cause before the forum which is trying him. His address was, indeed, replete with eloquence and pathos, but the Senate is obligated to judge the case solely on facts developed by the testimony delivered under oath. It was meet and proper for him to address the Senate, but that was not the opportune occasion, nor that the most convincing way for him to offer his testimony. Judging this case by the testimony submitted, I am driven, Mr. President, by the irresistible force of my conviction to say that I do not believe Mr. LORIMER is entitled to the seat he holds.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 32216) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of discussing briefly the pending proposition to institute a trade relation between the United States and the Dominion of Canada. I want to say clearly at the outset that I am opposed to this trade relation, this proposed reciprocity agreement. Before I enter upon that theme, however, Mr. President, I am disposed to give way to the temptation to make a slight reference to what the distinguished Senator from Oregon said last night; I think it was last night; so much has engaged the Senate and at such unseemly hours that I would not be sure. You remember Rip Van Winkle was not sure it was last night after his 20 years' sleep.

In all my experience in listening to political addresses I do not believe I ever heard a more doleful story of a man's own country than that which was given by the Senator from Oregon. I am sorry he is not in his seat now. I am told it is not courteous to make reference to a Senator who is not in his seat.

But I have violated many precedents of the Senate and may be permitted to violate another. Just think of it, this lamentation of last night, this foreboding of evil, came from Oregon, which is washed by the waves of the Pacific, which has been termed our new American lake; in Oregon, where the flowers are in bloom and children at play. I felt at the conclusion of the Senator's remarks that if I had been entitled to take any part in the performance arranged for last evening, I should have advised the Senator from Oregon to stop upon any street in Washington where he heard the music of the Salvation Army, in order that he might be where he could hear a rosy-cheeked hallelujah lassie shout "Glory to God." Then he might have taken new courage and might have set his face more hopefully toward the future.

I want to say to the Senators that you are not performing the duties devolving upon you. This is part of my mission. The Senate should proceed to vote on the resolution involving the honor and seat of a Member of this body. The Senate should proceed to vote squarely upon the measure concerning which I have the honor to speak. The Senate should also vote on the proposition to create a tariff commission. The Senate should consider every appropriation bill and close up its business and go home, as the American people have a right to expect the American Senate to do. There is no sort of necessity for a special session of Congress.

Senators discuss the way and manner of electing Senators. It has been said that if we change the manner of electing Senators, we are going to secure better quality. I say to you that what is needed here is more patriotism and less attention to political factions and less ambition for factional leadership. This Senate can not retain the respect of the American people unless higher ground is taken and more consideration given to the country.

Mr. President, when I return to my theme, after this digression for the good of the order, I am reminded that a few days ago the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] made complaint in relation to the uncertainty of the predictions offered by the Weather Bureau. I want to suggest to him that, while there may be doubts about the Weather Bureau's predictions, there can be no doubt about the political prediction which I made in this Chamber on December 15 last foretelling the new assaults to be made on the interests of the farmer in any new arrangement of the tariff.

Now it is proposed to arrange a swap with Canada, a sort of trade back and forth.

I am opposed to the adoption of the proposed trade agreement with Canada. I am opposed to it because it is unfair. It is popular because of misapprehension. Reciprocity is used in trade generally to cover up sharp practice or hypocrisy on one side, or on both. Reciprocity is never satisfactory. It represents borrowing hoes and plows and kitchenware on the farm. You can not keep books with a neighbor on the plan of borrowing and lending. Borrowing and lending represents an undefined swap with no date fixed for final settlement. Those who have lived on a farm know that a borrowing neighbor is the worst thing that ever happened. If the borrowing represents a clevis or neck yoke, it is found never to have been returned and is missing when most needed. Pardon these familiar agricultural expressions. Some of those who hear will understand. If this borrowing ever happens and you find the articles you wanted are missing, it will be evident that there has been reciprocity in operation; some neighbor has secured the article and never returned it. This reciprocity business is a masquerade. There are millions of people in the United States who will never be satisfied until we have free trade and they never can present it in its own name and right. Free trade in the past 15 years has tried many aliases. I think it is time that it traveled in its own name. I read a story once about some young fellows in a frontier town in Texas, where the opportunities for entertainment were few and where there were no amusements, who, after a night of it, felt in the early morning hours that there was little more to be done. One of them suggested that as a new means of entertainment, they get together and tell their real names. Now, in this discussion of reciprocity with Canada, we have gone far enough to tell our real names. We are told that the flow of Canadian grain into the United States will lower prices of the farmer's products, yet that nobody is going to pay anything less to the farmer. Once there was a merchant who said he sold his goods below cost and could not make anything except that he sold so much.

Sensible neighbors neither borrow nor lend. They prefer to buy and pay for what they get. Thus they preserve friendship and self-respect.

In reciprocity agreements each side feels that it has played a trick upon the other, and when one side discovers that it has had a majority of tricks played upon its side, notice is immediately given that reciprocity is at an end. The pending reciprocity, so it is stated, is to let Canadian grain in without doing any harm to the American grain producer. It is particularly stated that the proposed agreement is to let wheat in, in order that certain of the American people may have cheaper bread. In the same breath it is stated that this arrangement will do no harm because the price of wheat is, and has been for a century, fixed in Liverpool. By this Canadian arrangement, we presume, the American is to surrender the American market to the Canadian and take the Liverpool market in exchange.

But we are told that the price of wheat is fixed in Liverpool. I was born a Democrat and heard that alleged fact in my early youth. It made the West Democratic, at different times, but finally perished in face of the facts as fiction always perishes in the presence of facts. The Liverpool story is as old as the old Bryan statement about the parity between wheat and silver. If I could speak the dialect of Minnesota I could make this plainer.

The alarming thing is that occasionally an American farmer has been found willing to make this exchange. In this connection it might be well to inquire why the Canadian wants to get into the American market if the price of wheat is fixed in Liverpool.

If the Liverpool market is so good and desirable, why does Canada prefer ours? Have you thought of that? If it is such a glorious thing to ship wheat across the Atlantic, why not let George do it?

Is it possible that the Canadian maket is unsatisfactory? Is it possible that Canada prefers to feed the workmen who are engaged in building automobiles in Detroit, to taking any chance on the workman who buys his grain in Liverpool? The truth is probably to be found in the statement that Canada has discovered, through observation of more than a century, that a good home market beats any market across the water.

I am opposed to this Canadian trade agreement, because it seeks to present to Canada a fortune as great as all the Dominion's present possessions. It seeks to present to Canada what she has needed ever since that historic day when Wolfe died on the Plains of Abraham, to wit, a market.

The Dominion has had resources, but has been in need of a customer. The plan of the United States has been to locate the resources and the customer side by side. The Dominion is larger in area than the United States; yet the United States has 91,000,000 of people, while the Dominion has about 7,000,000 of people. Canada is big enough to be a country on her own account. She should frame up and carry out her own ambitions. She should make her own laws, build her own roads, and put up her own lighthouses. She should establish her own school system, pay her own taxes, and achieve her own results.

When we buy from Canada, we should pay her tariff duties.

When Canada buys from us, she should pay our duties. In this way there will be no old book accounts to settle; there will be no hard feelings, and we shall speak as we pass by.

When a Canadian comes to our markets, driving over our roads and bridges with his grain, he should be required to salute the American flag, and in lieu of the usual salute he should be required to pay a small amount in the way of tax for the privilege of a greater market than he has been able to create. The American people should be paid something for knowing how to create markets and promote enterprises. The Canadians should be penalized for not knowing how. No foreigner has any right to come in and do business with us without paying us something in the shape of taxes. I do not care whether a man comes in as a farmer or a manufacturer. A farmer is just as good as a manufacturer, and, in some cases,

It has been said that letting the Canadian farm products come into the American market will do no harm to the Americans. The markets of our great products are said to be fixed on the other side of the water. But suppose that when the American arrives in Detroit, Buffalo, Cleveland, Chicago, Milwaukee, or any other great city within easy water transportation of Canada, having with him a load of produce to sell, he is told that the Canadian has already been to town and has supplied everybody and that the American products must be hauled back home or shipped to Europe. Just as a matter of patriotism, I think the American ought to have an opportunity to get to town first. If anything is shipped abroad, it ought not to be ours.

If there were a river, like the Yellow River of China, flowing down through Canada and on down through the United States, and that river did not begin to spread over all the lowlands and drown all the people until it reached the United States, is there a man who would not say that something ought to be done to check the flow of that stream before it reaches our country? The illustration carries its own moral. The principal objection to this proposed donation to the Dominion of Canada is yet to be mentioned. This so-called reciprocity agreement practically confers American citizenship on the Canadian. And he is not even asked to take off his hat while the oath is administered. If he has been holding a mean view of the Republic, he need not change his mind while coming to our market. If he thinks the average American is a bluffer and pretender, he can continue to think so. If he regards our free institutions as a joke and our public schools as a farce, he can adhere to that opinion. He is not going to contribute anything for building roads or bridges on the American side. He is going to haul his grain over American roads. He is going to drive his cattle or hogs over our highways to our markets and sell to our people, returning to his Canadian home with his American money in his pocket. He can pass over an American road and in view of an American schoolhouse to which he has not contributed one penny. He can return to his cheaper land and paint his home or leave it unpainted, just as he elects. He can congratulate himself that he did not locate in the great Republic, but that he was reserved for better conditions, where he could have all the advantages of the great Republic with none of its responsibilities. He can congratulate himself that while he is a citizen of what many men consider the greatest kingdom in the world, he can sell his products in the greatest republic in the world.

After this American donation is made a citizen of Canada ought to feel proud. He will be, in fact, a cosmopolitan citizen. Great Britain is a great nation. We call her the "mother country." In enriching Canada we are enriching Great Britain. In case of war with the mother country, Canada would furnish the largest number of soldiers to fight the Americans, and the Canadian soldiers would have been matured and fattened in the American market. I am not a jingo, and I never expect a war with Great Britain; I am only suggesting what might happen. Why should we enrich Canada? Why should we not try to cultivate American soil? Why should we not make a renewed effort to ennoble American agriculture for the purpose of keeping American boys and girls on the farm?

If we are going to make Canada practically a commercial member of the American Republic, why should not Canada help to maintain the American Agricultural Department? Or, why should we not board up the American Agricultural Department and send Secretary Wilson back to his Iowa farm? Or, why should we not send him back to the Iowa College of Agriculture, inasmuch as some branches of his education appear to have been neglected?

If we are going to buy our surplus from Canada, why should we be spending millions of dollars in irrigation enterprises and in attempting to reclaim the arid lands of the Far West?

If the proposed donation is made to Canada, the donation masquerading under the name of reciprocity, there will be thousands of good farmers this very year removed from the Mississippi Valley to Canada for the purpose of farming cheaper land. In Canada these farmers will not be compelled to furnish the hired man with a horse and buggy and give him possession of Parlor A in the home. In Canada the hired man may be willing to sleep in the garret, as he did on the American farms until the doctrine of protection made the American farmer a gentleman. In Canada the American farmer can hire the Asiatic and produce wheat, oats, barley, and live stock for the American market, with no duty whatever. In Canada he can grow rich, provided the American market remains open to him.

But why is this trade arrangement proposed? It is put forward as a means of reducing the cost of living. It is boldly proposed that the farmer shall receive less for what he produces in order that those who do not produce food products may buy their food supplies cheaper. Food is only a small item of living expense at the present time.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] told us the other day that we spend more for liquor than we do for bread. Not a man here said anything about reducing the supply or the price of liquor. [Laughter.] A Senator from the South the other day asked the Senator from North Dakota if he had the audacity to suggest an increase in the cost of bread. The southern Senator had just been out to see the price of cotton, and come back rejoicing that the price had gone up. What we really want is reciprocity between cotton and corn. Both classes of farmers should make money.

The unhappy thought in connection with this entire affair is the refusal on the part of the public to consider the rights of the farmer. The farmers are regarded as a necessity, and there are those who feel their products are, like air and water—or ought to be—incidental to human life and without expense. It is also singular that the intelligent and civilized world calls a man great who has cornered the wheat market and made millions out of the public, while the same educated and refined civilization feels that the farmer ought to produce it without apparent profit. A speculator is a hero and gets his name in print when he endows colleges or gives large sums to the Young Men's Christian Association, but the producer is of no consequence. The large centers of population have been indorsing the Canadian agreement with the purpose, brazenly stated, to cheapen the products of the American farm. American history has never disclosed such a spectacle. If the American is noted for anything, it is his willingness to pay a "live-and-let-live" price.

The American people have received with applause every mention of reciprocity. It is applauded, because it is not understood. Nearly every man regards reciprocity as a means of cheating the other man. The laboring man regards reciprocity as a means of cutting down the earnings of the farmers, at the same time increasing everybody else's compensation. From this estimate of justice may angels and ministers of grace defend us! Pardon this departure from senatorial language; it may be necessary sometimes, in order to speak the truth.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator from Iowa, with his permission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. YOUNG. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, at some time during the debate this morning, about half past 3 or 4 o'clock, I suggested to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] that instead of reading the testimony he was reading to the Senate, with which we are all familiar, he had better read the New Testament, with which many of the Senators, particularly on the Republican side, are not familiar. I would ask the Senator from Iowa to call attention to some of the truths taught in the New Testament.

Mr. YOUNG. Yes; as has been said in all these other debates, "I shall come to that presently." [Laughter.]

But now, those who are not engaged in farming appear to want to fix the farmer's prices. The farmer has passed into the minority as a citizen. There are Members of Congress elected who never see a farmer except when they go through the country in an automobile or the 18-hour limited. Formerly all hats went off to the farmer. Now his toil is unappreciated. He is looked upon complacently. He is mainly thought to live in Kansas and wear whiskers.

If the farmer's prices were submitted to a referendum of all the American people, lower prices would be ordered.

The greasy loafer would come out of his cellar in the large city and would go to the polls and vote to reduce the cost of living. The same loafer has refused to go to the wheat field on special trains and there to receive $3 a day and board during the harvest time.

If a man were to go to the city of New York and offer steady employment to 50,000 present-day loafers who want to reduce the cost of living, not a man would leave the city to go out into the sunshine and the open. He probably would fear that he would become a decent man under the elements. Nature baptizes the soul of man who works out under the sky.

This Canadian contract is said to be popular. Boards of trade, commercial organizations, and all kinds of organizations composed of consumers have indorsed it. A great many men have voted for it without stopping to think. Others have not been considerate enough to care.

As a rule, American people sympathize with all strikes and all the aspirations of all classes for greater income.

A few nights ago 5,000 employees of the Government in the District of Columbia held a meeting in Washington to give expression in favor of greater pay. People of Washington generally sympathize with the movement. I do not think that the Government clerks are sufficiently paid. I hope their salaries can be increased. But their salaries should not be increased on account of the high cost of living, provided the free-trade arrangement with Canada reduces the cost of living, according to promise. The salaries should not be increased on account of the high cost of living, provided those who receive the salaries intend to immediately arrange to reduce the cost of living. At the meeting referred to, which was for the purpose of demanding higher wages, I have no doubt a resolution would have been unanimously passed, demanding a reduction of the earnings of the farmer. These are strange contrasts. But there are other contrasts. The American Congress shuts out the Asiatic on account of American citizenship, and then in the next breath proposes to require the farmer to furnish cheaper products while denying him cheaper labor. If the Asiatics were permitted to overflow this country and were to work with the same industry they do at home, they could produce enough from the American soil to feed one-half the people of the civilized world. But cheap food does not mean happiness in any line. It does not even mean plenty. When the corn laws of England were repealed, the workingman did not receive one additional comfort, and there are more idle men in London at this hour than before the corn laws were abrogated.

Why should the Pacific coast demand such protection at the hands of the Federal Government and receive it and the same protection to no greater extent be denied the American farmer?

The farmers of the South used to complain that cotton was only 5 cents a pound. There was no clamor for cheap cotton. Cheap cotton meant an impoverished people. There was rejoicing when cotton went up to 15 cents per pound. Since that time the South has prospered, banks are overflowing with money, and times are good.

Why should the cotton grower then be willing to join this crusade in the interest of Canada and against the American farmer?

The southern cotton grower should remember reciprocity as between himself and his brother farmer of the North who produces food products.

Yet I heard a Senator on this floor in this debate, a Senator who represents a cotton State, indignantly inquire if it was proposed to keep up the price of bread.

The price of bread bears about the same relation to unground wheat that the dollar shirt bears to raw cotton.

If Cuba were as large as Canada and produced cotton, there would not be a vote in Congress for the free admission of cotton at the ports of Charleston, New Orleans, Galveston, or Mobile. Is not the grain-producing farmer as well worthy of protection as would be the cotton-producing farmer under the conditions I have named? Should not the northern and southern farmer stand together? It is true that there are cotton mills in the South, and it is true that the mill hands must be fed, but has not the cotton grower more interest in the northern American farmer than he has in the New England manufacturer?

It is a pitiful story, but it is a fact, that a few thousand Massachusetts fishermen, some 30 miles from the center of intelligence in the United States, who object to the Canadian trade contract, have been able to receive more attention as regards their objections than have the farmers of the Mississippi Valley to the number of millions. Yet the fishermen do not grow fish. They do not plant them in the sea. An all-wise Creator put them there. The sea feeds millions of the world's poor. The Gloucester fishermen simply go down to the sea in ships. Their fishing vessels and their labor constitute their entire investment.

I now come to the causes leading up to this proposed calamity. The blame should be placed upon the shoulders of men who call themselves insurgents. I notice they have all disappeared from their seats and are probably under the ammunition wagon. [Laughter.] The insurgents, having been defeated in Congress, decided to carry their factional grievances out to the people, not for the sake of the people, but in order to whip another faction and establish new leaderships. They infuriated the people.

Some great newspapers, broken hearted because wood, pulp, and paper were not put on the free list, backed up the insurgents and urged them on. The insurgents made the speeches and the inflammatory arguments, and some of the great newspapers did the rest. The mournful part of it is that these insurgents were from prairie States, from the States producing farm products. The insurgents took the commercial lives of their constituents into their hands and went forth to battle, as I think, for their personal ends. Now the country proposes to respond to the insurgents by giving the newspapers what they ask for, and by giving the farmers what they did not ask for, and giving the insurgents what they did not expect. But the insurgents are geniuses. They know the game of politics. They are preparing to crawl out from under the proposed trade agreement while the newspapers are preparing to enjoy cheaper printing paper and the farmers are preparing to get it in the neck. The insurgents and the newspapers are guilty, but the blow will strike the farmer.

The insurgents say that they are opposed to this Canadian reciprocity because it does not go far enough. An Irishman confessed to his priest and said he had been stealing hay. The good father asked him how much. He said, "Your riverence, I might as well confess to the whole stack, as I am going back after the other half to-night." [Laughter.] The insurgents want another chance at the farmer.

Is there no other way to awaken that grand old party of Lincoln except to go through the valley of the shadow of defeat? How gloriously it came out of its last great defeat when it rallied and gave the country the gold standard.

Unfortunately the farmer is not organized to contend against the organizations, political and commercial. He has been told during the past 10 years that the tariff ought to be revised downward. He believed the politician and gave him his votes. Little did he dream that hides were to be put on the free list and that shoes were to remain protected. Little did he contemplate that the same principles were to be carried further and that the manufacturer was to buy in a free-trade market and sell in a protected market. Little did he believe that when real tariff cutting began he would be the first to be attacked. Little did he believe that flour and meat were to be protected, while wheat and live stock were to be put on the free list. But he went to the political meetings, he heard the statesman tell how he was taxed, and he voted for lower duties. Now comes the sad awakening. He may have faith in the politicians again; but if so, it will be after some reflection.

But men say the Republican party has outlived a protective tariff and can get along without it. I heard a man say that the Christian religion could get along without the Bible, the religion being so well established. Another man pointed to a workman on a ladder. He said: "The workman is up there all right. Why not remove the ladder?" The moral is apparent.

It is difficult to make American people contented with their own market. Without a merchant marine the average American wants to start out looking for the markets of the world. If Germany, France, Italy, or Japan had control of our market, they would look no further. Mr. President, I want to say for myself that I am opposed utterly and always to this proposed free donation to the Dominion of Canada. It would be a wrong to every American.

Big Tom Reed gave a tariff application to one of Æsop's fables. Tom Reed helped to make Iowa a protection State. The fable related that a lean, lank, hungry dog was swimming across a stream with a juicy beefsteak in his mouth. Seeing the shadow of the meat in the water, several times as big as it was, the dog dropped the meat he had to grab the meat he thought he saw, and lost both. The great speaker also related that there crawled up the bank on the other side the wettest and hungriest dog in all that neighborhood.

I omitted one thing when I referred to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE]. I had hoped that he would be in his seat by this time, but I will meet the requirements of courtesy and read this speech to him some time. He talked about the political boss and about the utter death of political liberty without fixing the exact date. I want to remind him that there is greater political liberty in the United States now than at any time since Columbus landed. There are 57 varieties of Republicans alone [laughter], and the returns are not all in. The Democratic varieties will be discovered when the new Congress convenes. [Laughter.] I am not through with this part of my theme; I can return to it just as readily as others can return to the Lorimer case. [Laughter.]

I want to say to those Republicans of the 57 varieties who are going out of the Senate, and those who may chance to come in, that if you pretend to be Republicans, you have a work to do. Having in mind the lamentations from Oregon, I think the American motto should be that we buy at home and build at home. What will our ambitious young men do, what are their ambitions for if they are not to have employment in our own country?

The farmer's life is one of toil. His prices are none too high. The past 10 years have been his most prosperous ones. The day has been at hand which the protectionists long foretold, and it is cruel, it is brutal, to continue to build hotels 20 stories high with a daily increase of price so far as every product on the table is concerned and to accompany all this with the demand that the raw material shall cost less. The northern farmer who grows food is just as worthy of a good price as the southern farmer who grows cotton. Both are just as worthy as the New England manufacturer. I want no Chinese wall built around America. I want America to trade with every country under the sun, but I want it to be on a cash basis. Reciprocity is free trade in a masquerade. It is the first move toward the destruction of the American style of living and all that we call American. The entire world would rejoice if the American Republic could be brought down to the world's level of earning and living and of prices. If I were master of the situation, the world would have to wait a long time. I am in favor of eight hours for a day's work. I am in favor of good pay for the men who do the work. I am in favor of gardens around the homes of the working man. I am in favor of the little home having a library and a piano. I am in favor of education and art. I am in favor of improvement, better roads, bigger and better schoolhouses, the church, and the music teacher in the village. I am in favor of more joy in the home and anything that will contribute to that end. I am in favor of loyalty to the American flag and to this great Republic. It is a privilege to live in this great land where liberty is universal and opportunity so inviting. I want every country in the world to prosper. This end can be accomplished by every country cultivating its own patriotism and keeping its own ideals.

The middle man may be robbing the public. The farmer is not doing it. He is working in the open. He is doing his duty, and is entitled to what he earns.

The country owes something to the American farmer. He found the way from the New England beginnings to the pathless West. His ax stroke in the forest awoke the silence of the ages. He built the church on the edge of the clearing. He contended with all the dangers of the frontier. He has given to the country a sturdy race of men. He blazed the trail from Daniel Boone's hunting ground in Kentucky to the valleys of California. He has fought the battles of the Republic from Lexington to Yorktown, from Bull Run to Appomattox. Activity made his sinews, dangers and responsibilities gave him his character and the alertness of his eye. His ear responded to the noise of the breaking twig as quickly as would the ear of the wild beast. His rifle has been above the door. His home has been sacred. It is no flattery to say he has been the bone and sinew of the Republic. He is neither a loafer nor a revolutionist. He is for honor and peace. We owe him more than forgetfulness when trade contracts are made and men are clamoring that everybody's products except their own shall be reduced in price.

In China the farmer is considered the first of citizens. This should be his standing in the great Republic of the United States.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I would not trespass on the time of the Senate at this juncture, especially in view of the short time remaining of this session and the fact that a large number of very important measures remain to be considered and disposed of if it were not for the vital importance of the Canadian trade agreement to the people of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent. North Dakota, however, is an agricultural State, and the acceptance of the agreement in its present form, or its rejection, means more to her people than it does to those of any other State in the Union. I should consider myself remiss in my duty did I not attempt to make clear how this agreement will affect my State injuriously. In my discussion of the question I shall endeavor to be as concise as may be consistent with clearness, and as brief as possible.

There are two questions that would naturally call for some consideration in connection with legislation affecting our commercial relations with another country—the one, the question of how the legislation will affect our own industries and our own commerce, and the other, the question of how it will affect our diplomatic relations with the other country and whether it will cause the two peoples to entertain more friendly feelings toward each other or whether it will arouse ill will. This latter question would naturally force itself upon us when considering such legislation directed toward our friend and neighbor on the north, Canada, so alike us in many respects and separated from us only by a political boundary line. Similarity of language, customs, industries, products, ideals, and habits of thought, and identity of interests have always tended to unite neighboring nations, and it is small wonder that some of us, viewing Canada's undeveloped resources and contemplating her undoubted future, have dreamed of the day when but one flag would wave over all of North America north of the Mexican boundary line. It has been intimated that such considerations weighed heavily with our Representatives who accepted the terms of the proposed trade agreement with Canada, now pending in this body.

If this were so, it might be well to hesitate before condemning this agreement on purely economic grounds and consider whether it were not better to bear for a while industrial and commercial disadvantages in the expectation of reaping gain and glory for our country in the future. It has been authoritatively denied, however, that this agreement was negotiated with any such purpose in view, and I for one shall accept this denial at its full value and decline to be influenced one way or the other by any consideration of whether the ratification of this agreement would be a forerunner of a commercial union between the two countries, to be followed later by a political union. As the amicable relations between the two countries at present leave nothing to be wished, and as a failure to ratify the proposed trade agreement by either country will be no cause for a break in these friendly feelings, we may dismiss the question of the political aspects of this agreement and consider merely its economic and industrial effects.

Certain sentimental reasons have been urged in favor of this agreement, which appear to me to be irrelevant. The fact that the Canadians are our "cousins" does not prevent them from competing with our producers whenever the opportunity offers; nor does it make the loss resulting to the American producer from such competition any less real; nor should the fact that many of our friends and relatives have emigrated to the Canadian northwest and are now residents of Canada influence us in this matter. It is our duty to remember that we are here solely to legislate for the benefit of the citizens of our own country, and that this consideration should be paramount in deciding the fate of this trade agreement.

The one question remaining is whether or not the adoption of this agreement will be beneficial to the people of the United States. If it is found that the agreement will benefit some section, some class, or some industry, the question arises whether this will be at the expense of some other section, class, or industry. These considerations will guide me in the discussion of the pending measure. I shall not debate whether or not it may be expected that the agreement will in time change the political relation of Canada to the United States or raise the question of whether this was considered by the representatives of either party to the agreement.

This agreement has been favored by different men for different reasons. Some have frankly expressed their hope of the annexation of Canada to the United States and the hope that this agreement will help bring this about. Some men, apt to judge legislation and other matters by the name applied to them, without examining into their real nature and result, favor this agreement as it has been called a reciprocity agreement, and this term presupposes mutual benefits. Others frankly admit they want free trade, and look on the adoption of this agreement as the first step in this direction, expecting the farmer, when he sees all his products on the free list, to demand that all other products be admitted free of duty. With many of these political considerations also enter in, and there are those who frankly admit that they hope for the ratification of this agreement, as it will tend to disrupt the Republican Party and to increase the dissatisfaction of the farmers with the Republican Party and the present administration, who will receive the blame if this agreement is ratified at this session of Congress.

Then there are those favoring the agreement because they see in its ratification a benefit to the industry in which they are engaged. They are:

1. The manufacturer. He hopes to extend his market in Canada because of reduced duties on imports into Canada. In some instances his profits on each article manufactured will be increased, as he will be able to import his raw materials from Canada free of duty and at a lower cost than if forced to depend on the United States for raw materials. Some, perhaps, hope in time that the removal of the duties on farm products will lower the cost of living to such an extent that the wages paid their employees may be decreased, or, at any rate, that they may stop increasing.

2. The railroads, who hope for increased business and increased profits carrying the Canadian products, especially the Canadian grain.

3. Business men and commercial organizations, who hope to extend their business operations with the freer commercial intercourse. In many cases their indorsement of the agreement arises from an imperfect understanding of its real nature.

4. Printing companies and large newspapers, who hope that the matters will in time be so adjusted as to give them free print paper.

Our former reciprocity treaty with Canada was negotiated in 1854 and was in operation 10 years. It admitted free of duty grains and breadstuffs of all kinds, animals of all kinds, meats, cotton, wool, seeds, vegetables, fruits, fish of all kinds and products of fish, poultry, eggs, hides and skins; stone or marble, crude; slate, butter, cheese, tallow, lard, horns, manures, ores of metals of all kinds, coal, pitch, tar, turpentine, ashes; timber and lumber of all kinds, unmanufactured; plants, shrubs, and trees; firewood, pelts, fish oil, rice, broom corn and bark, gypsum, grindstones, dyestuffs; flax, hemp, and tow, unmanufactured; unmanufactured tobacco; rags.

This treaty was abrogated in 1864. During its operation many causes of dissatisfaction arose. While our trade with Canada increased, it appeared that our imports increased more than our exports did, and it was charged that Canada derived all the benefits from the treaty. It was charged that while we were admitting free of duty practically all the products of Canada, that country not only did not admit free of duty those articles that we would naturally want to sell in her markets, but was actually engaged in gradually increasing the duties on those articles. Mr. Israel P. Hatch, in a report to Mr. Howell Cobb, Secretary of the Treasury, dated March 28, 1860, makes the following statement:

> The treaty was conceived in the theories of free trade and in harmony with the progress and civilization of the age. It was a step forward in political science. American legislation had been characterized by an extraordinary liberality to a foreign neighbor, placing her lines of transportation upon an equality with our own, and her merchants upon an equality with our own, in receiving foreign merchandise in bond. We conceded commercial freedom upon all their products of agriculture, the forest, and the mine, and they have either closed their markets against the chief productions that we could sell to them or exacted a large duty on admission into their markets.

The treaty had become unpopular long before the expiration of its 10-year term, and was abrogated by a joint resolution approved January 18, 1865.

The trade agreement which is now pending in the Senate places the following articles on the free list: Live animals; poultry, dead or alive; grains; peas and beans; corn, except into Canada for distillation; hay and straw; fresh vegetables; fresh and dried fruits; dairy products; eggs; honey; cottonseed oil; seeds, including flaxseed; fish of all kinds, except when packed in oil; fish oils; salt; mineral waters; timber and lumber, not planed; paving posts, railroad ties, and poles; wooden staves; pickets and palings; gypsum, crude; mica, unmanufactured, and mica, ground; feldspar; asbestos, not further manufactured than ground; fluorspar, crude; glycerin, crude; talc, not for toilet use; sulphate of soda; soda ash; extracts of hemlock bark; carbon electrodes; brass in bars or rods, and brass in strips, not polished; cream separators, and parts for repair; rolled iron sheets; crucible cast steel wire, value not less than 6 cents per pound; galvanized wire, 9, 12, or 13 gauge; type-casting and typesetting machines and parts; barbed fencing wire; coke; rolled round wire rods, in the coil, of iron or steel, not more than three-eighths of an inch in diameter and not less than No. 6 wire gauge; wood pulp and print paper. With a fine irony, it is provided that lemons, oranges, limes, grapefruit, shaddocks, pomelos, and pineapples grown in Canada are not to be admitted free of duty to the United States. I am certain I never met anyone who had ever heard of anyone guilty of trying to raise these fruits in Canada.

The agreement also reduces more or less the duties on a number of manufactures. It is apparent at first glance that the products to be admitted free are farm products, raw materials, and the products of fisheries. While the tariff is reduced somewhat on a few manufactures, the old duties are retained in most instances. It will be interesting to note the duties on some of the manufactures, the raw materials of which are on the free list. Live animals of all kinds are to be admitted free, but fresh meats pay a duty of 1¼ cents per pound; so do dried and smoked meats; canned meats are protected by an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent; fresh pork pays a duty of 1¼ cents a pound; so does bacon; extract of meat pays a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem; lard, a duty of 1½ cents per pound; tallow, 40 cents per 100 pounds; poultry is free, but canned poultry pays a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem. Wheat is free, and flour is protected by a duty of 50 cents a barrel; rye is free, but rye flour pays a tariff of 50 cents a barrel; oats are free, but oatmeal has to be protected by a duty of 50 cents per 100 pounds; corn is free, and corn meal pays a duty of 12½ cents a hundred; barley is free, and barley malt pays a duty of 45 cents a hundred pounds, and pearled barley pays a duty of ½ cent per pound; buckwheat is free, but on buckwheat flour there is a duty of ½ cent per pound; prepared cereals pay a duty of 17½ per cent ad valorem; bran and middlings, a duty of 12½ cents per 100 pounds; biscuits and cakes, sweetened, pay a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem. Flaxseed is free, but on linseed oil the old duty of 15 cents a gallon is retained. Fish is free, but when packed in oil it pays a duty of from 2 to 5 cents a package. Timber and unplaned lumber is free, but on planed lumber the duty ranges from 50 cents to $1.50 per thousand. It might be difficult to convince anyone that it costs $10 more to slaughter and dress a beef dressing 800 pounds, in the United States than in Canada; that it costs our mills 50 cents more to grind a barrel of wheat than it does the Canadian mills; that it costs 15 cents more to manufacture a gallon of linseed oil, or that it costs from 50 cents to $1.50 more to plane a thousand feet of lumber in the United States than it does in Canada.

I wish at this point to insert a table, showing the yield and value of crops produced by the United States and Canada in 1909 and 1910, which I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks.

This comparison does not include all the crops that the United States and Canada produce. For instance, in the 1909 table, I have left out the production of cotton and tobacco for the reason that Canada does not produce these crops, and similarly I have left out some of the crops that Canada does produce, but for the production of which in the United States I have not been able to obtain any figures. My purpose is not to compare the production of wealth in the two countries in any one year, or several years, but to compare their production of crops which they both produce and in the sale of which they will compete with each other. For the same reason I have omitted the yields and values of rye, buckwheat, flax, and potatoes in the table for 1910, as I had no figures available as to Canada's production of these crops in 1910.

The value of the corn, wheat, oats, barley, rye, buckwheat, flaxseed, potatoes, and hay produced by Canada in 1909 is thus found to be $479,159,700, and the value of these same crops produced in the United States is $3,856,512,000. The value of the corn, wheat, oats, barley, and hay produced in Canada in 1910 is found to be $410,546,000, and the value of these same crops produced in the United States in 1910 is similarly found to be $3,370,682,000. Omitting the figures as to corn, which Canada does not, and never will, produce in sufficient quantities to entitle her to be considered a competitor in its production, we have the following figures for 1909: The production of Canada, $466,399,700; the production of the United States, $2,263,544,000. For 1910 the figures are $398,454,000 and $1,846,714,000, respectively. In other words, the production of Canada in 1910 of wheat, oats, barley, and hay is in value equal to almost 22 per cent of the production of the United States. When we consider that the production of these crops in Canada, especially of wheat and flax at present, is increasing by leaps and bounds, we can not get away from the fact that Canada is and will in the future be a competitor to be reckoned with in the production of agricultural products, and I submit that, assembled here to legislate for the whole people, we can not, if we would do our duty, avoid the consideration of what effect the removal of the duties on all farm products will have on our agriculture, the industry on which the prosperity of this Nation must ultimately rest.

It has been urged that the absorptive capacity of our markets is so great that the influx of Canadian products will not affect American prices; it has also been argued that the price of most if not all of the products of our farms is set in the world's market and that the removal of the duties on them will have no effect on their prices. So far as the first contention is concerned, I believe that a hasty examination of the figures of production of Canadian crops will convince anyone that Canada produces enough wheat, oats, barley, and other crops to affect the prices of those products when coming into competition with them. With regard to the second contention there might be a difference of opinion. It may be instructive to examine in this connection the production of wheat for the last 10 or 11 years, and also the exports of wheat and wheat flour during the same years. I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks a table showing the production and export of wheat for the years 1900–1910.

Production and exports of wheat by the United States for the years 1900–1910.

The exports of wheat flour have been reduced to bushels, at the rate of 4½ bushels to the barrel.

It is apparent from these figures that while our production of wheat is increasing our yearly exports are decreasing, due to the fact that our consumption of wheat is increasing more rapidly than our production. Following the short wheat crop of 1904, our export of wheat and wheat flour fell to 44,000,000 bushels. The short crop of 1910 will, in all probability, leave a surplus for export, although it will very likely be less than that of any year since 1904.

So long as we continue to export considerable quantities of wheat, the tariff on wheat will not raise the domestic prices above export prices, except in exceptional cases, as, for instance, the formation of a corner in wheat. As many people have found to their sorrow, however, successful corners are few and far between. But when our competitor is as close a neighbor as Canada the duty on wheat does tend to steady our markets by preventing the Canadian crop from being dumped into them in the fall. The Canadian northwest is a new country. As in other new countries, men with little capital go there to win a home and wrest their fortune from the soil. In the early years of their settlement money is short; their purchases are made on credit, with the agreement to pay for them as soon as the crop is thrashed. The result is that practically all the bills of the settler in a new region must be met in the fall. As soon as the crop is thrashed, the farmer must hurry his crop to the market in order to meet his obligations, and the great bulk of the crop is marketed within a short time after it has been thrashed. This breaks the market. The exceptionally heavy receipts with no unusual demand depresses the price below its normal level, and the farmer who is forced to sell at this time does not receive the price for his wheat that he should. Agricultural papers and others interested in the marketing of farm produce have for years urged the wheat growers of the United States to "hold their wheat;" not to rush it to market as soon as thrashed, but to sell it gradually. Until late years, even though the farmers have recognized the wisdom of this plan, it has not been followed, for the simple reason that the great majority of the farmers in the wheat-growing sections were not in a position to do so. They were compelled to sell most of their wheat in the fall, and the wheat markets were regularly glutted. Now this is changed; money is more plentiful and the average farmer can hold his wheat if he feels that market conditions are such that he will not realize its full value. With the free admission of Canadian wheat, however, there is danger that we shall again have the rush of wheat into our terminal markets, especially Minneapolis and Duluth, in the fall, with the consequent unsteadiness of the market and the depression of the price of wheat below the point where it should be. This can not fail to affect our wheat growers, even though we may still be exporting large quantities of wheat and wheat flour.

A consideration of the figures as to our production and our consumption of wheat, however, will convince anyone that in time the latter will overtake the former and that we shall consume all the wheat we produce. When that point is reached the tariff on wheat will increase the domestic price of wheat. With the tariff retained on wheat, I do not believe that we shall import any considerable quantities of it for years to come. We do not now produce all the wheat of which we are capable. There is still land left which will produce wheat, and although this land, or much of it, will not grow wheat profitably with low prices, it will produce a large amount of wheat if the owners are assured that the price will remain high enough to make it profitable. This applies not only to land which is at present owned by private individuals, but also to considerable public land still remaining. Most of the increase in our wheat production, however, must come from increased yields rather than from increase of acreage. More intensive cultivation will increase the yield per acre, and with the increase in price which will follow the overtaking of our production by our consumption, such intensive cultivation will be brought about. If the tariff on wheat is removed, however, such improved cultivation of our wheat lands will be delayed. Agriculture is an industry of diminishing returns; after a certain point in the cultivation of land has been reached, although additional cultivation will increase the yield, each additional unit of crop so produced will cost more in capital and labor expended than did the preceding units. Consequently, those additional units will not be produced until the price received for the product has reached such a point that it will be profitable to expend this additional amount of capital and labor in producing them. With our markets thrown open to Canadian wheat, the production of which is less expensive than that of most American wheat, the price will be prevented by the Canadian wheat from reaching the level making it profitable to raise the additional bushels per acre.

It is perhaps not absolutely necessary, in order to bring about this increased production, to retain the tariff and thus increase the price of wheat. If the tariff is removed from all articles imported from all countries, the cost of the articles that the farmer buys will be lessened, and the production of the additional bushels per acre may be brought about by lessening the cost of production instead of by increasing the price of the product.

If the farmer is to continue to suffer under the disadvantages of buying in a protected market, however, and yet be compelled to compete with the Canadian farmer, we shall be importing wheat from Canada for our own consumption within a comparatively few years. The fact of the cheaper production of Canadian wheat will operate to draw American capital and labor into the Canadian Northwest even at a more rapid rate than has been the case these last few years. It would seem that no proof is required of the proposition that older lands can not compete with newer, more productive lands in producing wheat. It may be instructive, however, to compare the yields of the Canadian wheat fields with those of our own. The average yield of the Canadian wheat fields in 1909 was 21½ bushels per acre. The average yield of the United States in 1909 was 15.8 bushels per acre. The average yield of Minnesota was 16.8; of North Dakota, 13.7; of South Dakota, 14.1; of Kansas, 14.5. For the sake of comparison I use the figures of 1909, as the average yield of the Canadian fields in 1910 is not available, and the year 1910 was an abnormal one in many of our grain States, the average yield falling to 5 bushels per acre in North Dakota. The value of farm lands in the great grain-producing Provinces of Canada are given as follows for the year 1909: Manitoba, $28.94 per acre; Saskatchewan, $21.54 per acre; Alberta, $20.46 per acre. It is safe to say that equally productive land can not be bought for those prices in the United States. The cheaper land and its greater productiveness explains why the American farmer can not compete on equal footing with the Canadian farmer, even not taking other factors into consideration. If we, the Republican Members of Congress, are to observe the rule laid down in the Republican platform adopted at Chicago in our tariff legislation that the tariff should be equal to the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, we can not justify ourselves in voting to remove the tariff from the products of the farm unless it is conclusively shown that these duties do not benefit the farmer now and will not benefit him in the future.

The considerations as to the tariff on wheat apply with greater force to the tariff on other farm products. Our yearly flax crop, for instance, has from 1908 until last year ranged from 23,000,000 to 29,000,000 bushels. Last year's crop was 14,116,000 bushels. As we retain for domestic consumption from nineteen to twenty-six million bushels annually, it will easily be seen where the duty on flax is going to affect its price this year. The average yield of flax in 1909 was 15.98 bushels to the acre in Canada and 9.4 bushels in the United States. I do not mean to assert that the difference in favor of the Canadian flax grower is always as great as this. The yield of flax will vary more from year to year than that of wheat, and I do not have the figures for a series of years.

In 1910 the average yield of flax in the United States was 4.8 bushels per acre. I have not been able to obtain the figures as to the Canadian yield for that year. It is evident that the cost of raising a bushel of flaxseed is greater in the United States than it is in Canada. The duty on flax under the Payne Tariff Act is 25 cents per bushel. This certainly did not cover the difference in cost of production in 1909, and according to the principle enunciated in the Chicago platform of 1908, instead of removing this duty, it ought to be increased. It will affect the price of flax this year, and its removal can not be excused on the ground that it has no effect on the price and is therefore of no benefit to the farmer. In normal years North Dakota produces about three-fifths of all the flax produced in this country. In 1909 North Dakota's flax crop had a value of $22,340,000. In 1910 the crop was estimated to have a value of $13,578,000. If we remove the duty, we shall reduce the value of this crop by an amount depending on the amount of flax that Canada raised last year.

I shall not take up the other crops separately. It is enough to say that the cost of producing each is less on the new lands in Canada than it is on lands which have been cropped for a number of years in the United States. I wish to insert here a newspaper clipping, showing how the farmers of western Canada view the agreement, which I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read.

The Secretary read as follows:

FARMERS FOR RECIPROCITY—AGREEMENT WELCOMED IN WESTERN CANADA, SAYS SPOKESMAN—OPENING UP OF MARKETS, IT IS ASSERTED, WILL CLEAR WAY FOR THE RAISING OF NEW CROPS.

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, February 25.

"As far as the reciprocity agreement goes, it has the complete approval of the western farmers, but dissatisfaction is expressed at the smallness of the reduction in the duty on agricultural implements."

This was the statement to-day of James Bower, president of the Canadian National Council of Agriculture and of the United Farmers of Alberta, who is in Ottawa to urge the Government to grant in full the demands made by the farmers' delegation of December 15.

"If, however," said Mr. Bower, "the contention of some is correct, that the agreement is but the first step toward breaking down the whole system of protection, the farmers may well hail it with unqualified satisfaction.

"By opening up new markets the agreement would, without question, give a great impetus to the agricultural industry, particularly in western Canada, and would prove equally advantageous to the farmers of eastern Canada, especially in dairy products and hay.

"The antireciprocity speakers are absolutely wrong as to how it would affect western farming conditions. Take barley, for instance. Western Canada is particularly well adapted to growing barley, but for lack of a market none has been grown except for home consumption. Now, with the prospect of a market, we could engage in growing the crop, which is most suitable to our natural conditions, and with the assurance of competition in the cattle trade and an outside market for our stock the cattle trade would receive a wonderful stimulus.

"But perhaps the greatest boon reciprocity would confer upon the farmers of the West would be its indirect results in reducing freight rates, which would mean increased production all along the line. This would, of course, mean a greater demand for manufactured articles in the West, and a greater ability to pay for them."

Mr. GRONNA. It has been argued that the free admission of Canadian grains will benefit the farmer because the Canadian wheat will not be shipped to Liverpool to break the market there, but will be shipped to the United States with its greater markets, where it will be stored and absorbed and later shipped gradually to Liverpool, steadying our own markets by steadying the Liverpool market, and that the American grain grower will thus secure control of the marketing of the Canadian grain as well as his own, and will consequently control the market to a fuller extent than he now does. How seriously this argument is taken by those who advance it is something that I have not been able to discover. It would seem that it is needless to call anyone's attention to the fact that shipping 50,000,000 or 100,000,000 bushels of wheat into Minneapolis or Chicago is not going to give the American grain grower any control of the market. The American grain grower is not going to buy Canadian wheat. I believe that it is quite enough to ask him to share the American market with the Canadian wheat grower without expecting him also to buy the wheat of his competitor. I do not say that the Canadian wheat will not be bought after it has been shipped to our terminal markets and perhaps held for a while before being shipped to Liverpool or being ground into flour; I do say that it will not be the American grain grower that does this. The farmer does not as a rule speculate in his own products; he is quite content if he can secure a reasonable price for his products, and he is not going to buy foreign wheat and haul it to his own granary and keep it there for two, three, or four months in order to steady the Liverpool market, strange as this may seem to certain gentlemen. I also wish to make another statement in this connection, which I do not believe anyone will dispute, and that is that the persons who do buy this Canadian wheat will not do it for the purpose of increasing the price that the American farmer will get for his wheat, and that the result of the trading in Canadian wheat will not be to increase the price paid the American farmer. It is a decidedly novel and unique theory that the price of wheat can be raised by throwing increased supplies on our own markets.

The ratification of this agreement has been urged on the ground that the reduction of duties on farm products will decrease the high cost of living, and I have no doubt that many people who have not examined its provisions are under the impression that this would result. There is one noticeable thing about this agreement, however, to which I called attention at the opening of my speech, and that is that while the farmer's products are to be admitted free, the food products manufactured from these still pay a duty. Wheat is free, but flour pays a duty of 50 cents a barrel. Cattle are free, but meats pay a duty of 1½ cents per pound. We are to admit oats free, but oatmeal pays a duty of 50 cents a hundred. Barley is free, but pearled barley pays a duty of 50 cents a hundred. Aside from fish—which is to be admitted free at the cost of the New England fisherman—fresh vegetables, fruits, dairy products, eggs, honey, and salt, the consumer will find nothing that he can eat on the free list.

It is a well-known fact that most people do not eat live animals, and they will therefore buy their meat from the protected beef trust; they do not eat wheat, and when they come to purchase flour they find a duty of 50 cents a barrel on it; they do not eat oats, and their breakfast oatmeal is assessed a duty of 50 cents a hundred. Poultry may be eaten dead or alive without paying a duty. It is grim humor to pretend to lower the cost of living by lowering the duties on the raw materials, which the consumer does not buy, and retaining the duties on the finished products which he does buy. I do not know that anyone has ever seriously charged that the farmers get too high prices for their products or that they exact too high prices and are to blame for the high cost of living, and removing the duties on their products is certainly not going to reduce the cost to the consumer so long as the manufactured product is protected.

The farmers who are asked to share their markets with the Canadian farmers will derive no benefit from this agreement. It opens no new markets to them, and it reduces the duties on practically nothing that they buy. It is true that certain kinds of lumber is to be admitted free, but it is unplaned lumber, the kind that the farmer and other consumers of lumber do not buy and do not use. We do not export wheat, or oats, or barley, or flaxseed, or the other products of the farm to Canada, and we never shall. Canada will be exporting these products long after we have ceased to produce more than enough for our own consumption. It is noticeable that the few manufactures from which the duties have been removed, outside of rough lumber, print paper, and wood pulp, are those of which we never have imported any appreciable quantities from Canada and in all probability never shall. It is evident that whatever interests may derive benefit from this agreement, the only ones to suffer will be the farmers, fishermen, and producers of raw materials. Ample provision seems to have been made against any manufacturing industry being injured, with the exception of the paper industry, and in the case of this industry it does not appear that their products will be admitted free for some time to come, if ever.

I wish to insert at this point a table prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, showing the exports and imports of Canada to the United States and to the United Kingdom, and also her total exports and imports, which I ask to have made a part of my remarks without being read:

Figures for the years 1900, 1905, and 1906 are for the fiscal years ending June 30 of the years stated.

Figures for the year 1907 are for the nine months ending March 31 of that year, owing to the fact that the Canadian Government changed the fiscal year from ending June 30 to ending March 31.

Figures for the years 1908, 1909, and 1910 are for the fiscal years ending March 31 of the years stated.

Data taken from the Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1910, Part I.

BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

This table shows that our exports to Canada increased from $102,060,177 in 1900 to $217,500,000 in 1910, and that our imports from Canada increased from $54,500,000 in 1900 to $110,600,000 in 1910. It does not appear that our commerce with Canada was in such a languishing state that it was necessary to negotiate such a one-sided agreement as this in order to revive it. Of her total imports in 1910 Canada took almost 60 per cent from the United States, and of her exports during the same year we took considerably less than 40 per cent. Is it to be presumed that our commerce with Canada will be more favorable to us in case this agreement should be ratified in its present form? I believe not, viewed as a whole. It is possible that there may be certain interests whose products will enter Canada more easily and which will, therefore, reap benefits from this agreement, but it will be at the expense of other producers.

This agreement was negotiated in the dark. We have been furnished with no information as to what considerations led our representatives to insist on certain reductions of duties or to grant others. We have not been informed what facts, if any, they considered in determining which industries should be favored and which should not be. The more the agreement is examined the less favorably is one impressed with tariff revision by executive order. The agreement has come before us under conditions which make it impossible to secure the many changes which would be necessary to make it an arrangement beneficial to this country. One can not escape the conclusion that it is the result of hasty and ill-considered action, and we are tempted to ask whether our representatives who agreed to this agreement did not unwittingly enact the rôle of the trusting stranger in the large city.

In its drafting the plain words of the Chicago platform, in accordance with which it is pretended to have been formulated, are ignored, and the plain facts of present industrial conditions are disregarded. A few industries are to be aided to extend their markets into Canada, and in order to do this the interests of the American farmer are to be sacrified. The only consolation offered the farmer is that he has been so badly treated in the past whenever tariff legislation has been enacted that he can stand a little more at this time and not feel it very much. The dissatisfaction which arose from the inequalities and injustices of the tariff law of 1909 is used as an excuse for perpetrating further injustice. In this partial tariff revision the duties attacked are the very ones with which there has been no dissatisfaction, as their effect in the past has been almost negligible so far as the price of the products is concerned, and entirely so, so far as the cost of the articles manufactured from them is concerned.

The Chicago platform demanded that the difference in cost of production at home and abroad should be the measure of protection in every instance. This agreement, in effect a revision of certain selected duties, makes no attempt to base its reduction on this principle. Instead of doing so, it removes many duties which do not cover the difference in cost of production, and does not change, or changes only very slightly, duties far in excess of this difference.

The one crying need at the time of the revision of the tariff in 1909 was the lack of reliable, authoritative, and accurate information as to what duties would be just and reasonable on the different articles. If there is one thing for which the country has pronounced it is for a commission to obtain facts and data on which future tariff acts may be constructed, and if there is one thing which the people of this country do not want, it is a tariff constructed by guesswork. We have at present a board that is gathering facts and data as to the cost of production at home and abroad, and we expect to vote hundreds of thousands of dollars for it to continue its work. Yet, we have a tariff schedule drawn up for us and presented to us with the request and implied threat that we must make it law, without any facts justifying the different rates being presented, and with the tariff board, on which everybody relied, apparently having been entirely ignored. It would appear that the rational way to revise the tariff would be to secure the information necessary to effect a scientific revision, before undertaking to change any duties, except in cases of urgent need or where everybody admitted that the duties were too high. Having obtained this information, if it were a question of which rates to change first, it would seem that the ones to select would be the ones the retention of which worked a hardship on the consumer. The course pursued in this instance has been exactly the opposite. With no attempt apparent to discover the effect of the proposed changes, evidently with no facts available bearing on them, seemingly with nothing else as a guide than a desire to reduce and remove some duties on Canadian products, the duties selected are the very ones which everybody agreed could well afford to wait until the last for revision, as their effects in the past have been negligible, they are not onerous at present, and there is no danger of any trusts or combinations forming behind them to force prices up to unreasonable levels.

It has been hinted that this has been done in retaliation for the criticism bestowed upon the tariff act of 1909. I do not believe that this is so, and I sincerely hope that it is not. I did not consider the 1909 tariff act equitable, but this partial tariff revision is more unjust than that act was.

The farmers, the very class who have in the past derived the least benefit from protection, are singled out as the ones to be deprived of whatever benefits they might derive from it in the future. The farmer does not ask for any special favors, but he does demand justice in the making of tariff laws as well as in the making of other laws. If we are to change our policy and adopt free trade, he can perhaps better afford to do this than any other class, but he will demand that it be free trade for all, and not merely free trade for him and protection for all the other industries. If we are to retain the protective policy, he will demand that any benefits that might lie in protective duties on his products be accorded him just as readily as it has in the past been to other industries. I warn Senators that the ratification of as unjust an agreement as this will have its inevitable effects. If the farmer must sell his products in competition with all the world, he will enforce his demand that he be permitted to buy his goods in the world's markets, and in the industrial convulsions which will accompany a sudden change of industrial policy, it will be found that the farmer will suffer less than the person engaged in any other industry.

I am in favor of more liberal trade agreements, not only with Canada, but with all countries. In the making of these agreements, however, it is essential that all industries are given a square deal, and that one industry is not benefited at the expense of another. I will not support an agreement which gives the brewing interests cheaper barley at the expense of the farmer, gives the Milling Trust cheaper wheat at the expense of the farmer, benefits the Meat Trust at the expense of the farmer, and aims to extend the market of the Steel Trust at the expense of the farmer. Neither do I intend to vote to sacrifice the interests of the farmer in order to add to the earnings of the railway magnates of the Northwest, whose millions are made up of the forced contributions of the farmers, and who are now engaged in applying epithets to those who feel that the interests of the farmer is deserving of consideration.

It is no more fair to make an agreement of this kind than it would be to admit all the cotton manufactures free of duty from England and Germany while retaining the duties on farm products and all other manufactures. It has not been shown how the ratification of this agreement will benefit anyone in this country, with the exception of a few large manufacturing interests and certain railways, and it is apparent that the farmer will have to pay the cost.

The name reciprocity attached to this agreement is misleading. When Canada demanded the opening of our markets to her farm products she knew, and we ought to have known, that she was giving very little in return for what she was getting. The reciprocity that Blaine espoused did not contemplate the admission of foreign goods in competition with ours; the cardinal principle of it was the extension of our foreign markets by the removal of duties on goods which we did not produce ourselves and which would therefore not compete with American products. The reciprocity for which the late President McKinley pleaded aimed at the extension of our foreign markets by the removal of such of our duties as were no longer needed to encourage our own industries. Neither of them aimed at the extension of the market of one industry by sacrificing another industry. I can not find that the principle on which this agreement must have been based has anything in common with those enunciated by Blaine and McKinley. I believe that the era of high tariffs is past; I believe that the American producer will in the future have to content himself with a tariff equal only to the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. It is possible that in their present temper the American people will go farther even than this. While part of this may be brought about by wisely and justly drawn reciprocity agreements, I am inclined to believe that more will be brought about by tariff laws applying to all countries alike and discriminating against no country not treating us unfairly. But whatever tariff policy we may pursue, it is essential that in applying it we treat all industries and sections fairly, and do not discriminate against one in favor of another.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 315, relative to the right of Mr. LORIMER to a seat in the Senate from the State of Illinois.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senate has been in constant session from yesterday morning until now, with the exception of about three hours. Such a session as last night, with the burdens upon us for the next few days, is too exacting for the human system. It is the father of malaria and grippe and pneumonia, and so far as I am concerned I shall not ask the Senate to repeat last night's performance.

I do not think it would advantage the public business; I do not think last night's session advantaged the public business; but to-morrow, Mr. President, I shall ask the Senate to take up appropriation bills, and I shall ask the Senate at 5 o'clock or half past 5 o'clock to take a recess, not for such a session as that of last night, but for actual business and the disposal of appropriation bills. It need not be a prolonged, drawn-out, exciting session; but three or four hours spent on appropriation bills will be a profitable investment of the time of the Senate.

There is no reason, Mr. President, why by a reasonable hour, after a reasonable recess, the Senate can not to-morrow pass the agricultural appropriation bill, the Post Office appropriation bill, the counsular and diplomatic appropriation bill, the fortifications appropriation bill, and the Military Academy appropriation bill, and get them out of the way, leaving the great appropriation bills for the last two or three days for the Senate to consider.

I can not have my way about this, Mr. President. I do not know what has been done and I do not know what trafficking has been done; I do not know but that there is some other program that is better than this. I shall feel, however, if this can not be carried out, that I have at least presented it to the Senate, with a view of the waning length of the session and the fact that Saturday noon, only four days away, stands before us as the end of everything that is to be done. Unless something is done in the way, first, of passing these appropriation bills and getting them out of the road and into conference, later we may not be able to properly consider the larger appropriation bills, which are full of controversies.

I have been appalled, Mr. President, as I have studied the great sundry civil appropriation bill and the naval appropriation bill, carrying together nearly $300,000,000, and full of propositions and measures—I say "measures" included in the appropriation bill—that will necessarily involve controversy and discussion. I am appalled as I have been attempting with the clerks to get the sundry civil bill in readiness, so that we may report it later. It has never been so formidable as it is this year sent to us; it never has been so large. It comprises over 230 pages, bristling from the first clause to the last with every possible kind of provision that arouses interest, and confronts objection and controversy.

The naval bill is no better; and the final deficiency appropriation bill is different from any other deficiency bill that we have had of late years. It has been the fashion here to put on most of the items pertaining to such a bill at an early day on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. That was not done this year; and the general deficiency is the cleaning-up bill.

I want to-morrow to be given to the consideration of the other bills I have named that we have got to get out of the way. As I have said, I shall not ask the Senate to stay here to-night for any proposition. If it does stay it will do so, so far as I am concerned, without any suggestion on my part. Neither do I think it will be good tactics in the way of setting forward the public business. I am sure it will not be for the benefit of the Senate in its condition and in its capacity for work in the succeeding days of the session.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine permit an inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HALE. Certainly. I am going to make a motion, but I will yield.

Mr. BAILEY. Before the Senator submits the motion I simply want to inquire if it is the Senator's opinion, in view of the statement he has made, that the appropriation bills must fail unless the Senate can address itself to them within a reasonable time?

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt whatever about that, Mr. President. We are going to have very hard work to get them through, anyway, and we are likely to be confronted with another condition as to these great bills. The Senator the other day made a suggestion that I have heard very many times since. Certain authorities, and good authorities, in the other House insist that the popular branch, which comes from the people, instead of this declining Congress, ought to make up the supply bills for the next session; that it should make up the naval bill, the Post Office bill, the sundry civil bill, and the pension bill; that that branch represents the last verdict of the people; that there are no subjects of such importance as the framing of the supply bills; and that that work, instead of being done by a declining and discredited, as they call it, Congress, shall be done by the new organization. We have got to meet that difficulty, Mr. President, and it will grow all the time.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HALE. Certainly; I will yield for any suggestion.

Mr. BURROWS. With a view of facilitating the purpose which the Senator from Maine has in mind, of early action upon appropriation bills and other matters, I am constrained to ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday, to-morrow, at 1.30 o'clock, the vote be taken upon Senate resolution No. 315 without further debate.

Mr. HALE. What resolution is that?

Mr. BURROWS. The resolution in reference to the election of Mr. LORIMER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the unfinished business. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that on to-morrow, Wednesday, at 1.30 o'clock, without further debate, the vote be taken upon Senate resolution 315, known as the Lorimer resolution.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, as the Senator puts that, it can only occupy the time of the Senate to be consumed by a single roll call. But I am not so unreasonable as to insist upon my program when it is only to be varied so little by what will dispose of a controverted question, if no Senator objects to that proposition and everybody is in favor of it. Let me ask the Senator whether this is going to be supplemented by some other proposition that will take time?

Mr. BURROWS. I do not know about that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator yield to a motion for a recess?

Mr. HALE. No; I certainly do not intend to vote for a recess to-night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan and Mr. BEVERIDGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine has the floor.

Mr. HALE. I will ask that the proposition be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will again state the proposition, which is that at 1.30 o'clock to-morrow, Wednesday, a vote be taken, without further debate, upon resolution No. 315, known as the Lorimer resolution.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I would like to have it understood, if that is agreed to, that no effort will be made this evening to take up any other measure.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, as soon as this talk has ceased I propose to move that the Senate adjourn; that nothing be taken up this evening.

Mr. KEAN. Why not take a recess and allow the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to speak to-night?

Mr. HALE. Unless the Senate overrules me, I will not consent to a night session, and Senators ought not, after last night's experience, to ask anybody to come here to-night.

Mr. STONE. I certainly have not any objection to the request for unanimous consent if it is understood that there will be no other business taken up to-night.

Mr. HALE. So far as I am concerned, unless the Senate decides otherwise, I shall move to adjourn, because I do not think as I have said—and I hate to repeat myself—it is good management, and I do not think it is good tactics.

Mr. STONE. Then, if the Senator will permit me, I consent, or, rather, I do not object to the request for unanimous consent, with the understanding, in good faith, that no effort will be made and no motion made to take up any other proposition to-night or lay it before the Senate.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I would say to the Senator from Missouri that, upon unanimous consent being granted to my request, I propose to ask that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, then I shall object.

Mr. BURROWS (continuing). When the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] desires to address the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I shall object to any session to-night.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator does not object to the request for unanimous consent, but only to the recess?

Mr. HALE. I do, if there is to be a recess.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I will not object if a proposition is to be made to take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening, no other matter to be taken up except the remarks of the Senator from Oklahoma at the evening session.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I understand that it is the proposition that nothing but that shall be taken up.

Mr. BURROWS. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has been waiting for several days to address the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I am willing——

Mr. OWEN. I think the matter might be easily adjusted by adjourning now, as the Senator from Maine desires, until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, and permitting me then to address the Senate. I shall not take very long. I do not expect to make a prolonged speech.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to that.

Mr. BURROWS. Does the Senator from Maine object to the other proposition for a recess?

Mr. HALE. I do.

Mr. BURROWS. And nothing else to be taken up?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I do, unless it is settled that no business shall be transacted except speeches. I do not object to the proposition of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], though I do not think we need to meet before half past 10 to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest that the Senate continue in session.

Mr. BURROWS. Let us come to an understanding about this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Michigan, as stated by the Chair?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The yeas and nays having been ordered on the unfinished business, I understand no business can come before the Senate until that order is vacated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is in error as to that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let us see whether I am in error.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But the Chair rules that the Senator is in error.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But I should like to make my point. This is the point I desire to make: The yeas and nays having been ordered on the pending question, as I understand the rule it will not be possible to consider appropriation bills with that order pending. Am I in error about that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan is in error.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the opinion of the Chair—it not being a decision at this time—would be promptly and rather vigorously contested. But that is a mere academic question now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That question has not been raised. The Chair made the statement in answer to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that with a question of the highest privilege pending, and the yeas and nays ordered on it, the demand for the regular order brings that up at any time and against any other matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes; but that was not the inquiry propounded to the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That was the inquiry I was endeavoring to make. Perhaps I did not make myself clear.

Mr. BAILEY. That was the thing I had in mind.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What I had in my mind was whether, if we vote to adjourn until to-morrow on the motion of the Senator from Maine, and then unanimous consent is given to vote on the Lorimer resolution at 1.30 p. m., the session in the morning, up to the time of voting, could be occupied by the consideration of an appropriation bill to the exclusion of any other business?

Mr. HALE. If the Senate so voted, undoubtedly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate so voted at a time when the motion could be put, yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That would be in the control of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And would be debatable?

Mr. KEAN. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; a motion to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation bill or other matter is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire to say that some of us have listened very patiently to discussion of the pending case which is about to be decided. I have not thus far said a word regarding it, and may not do so to-morrow, although I do not want to be foreclosed by this arrangement. I am unwilling to give my consent that a vote may be taken upon this matter unless the utmost freedom of discussion within the time allowed shall be permitted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It remains with the Senate to-morrow morning to determine whether it desires to debate the matter further or not.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, upon the assurance—and I am in the habit of taking the word of fellow Senators—that nothing will be done this evening, except discussion and the making of speeches, that no vote will be had, instead of moving—to-morrow will take care of itself—that the Senate adjourn, I will move that it take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening, and that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet at half past 10 to-morrow morning. There are three or four committees that want to have meetings about very important appropriation bills.

Mr. CULLOM (to Mr. HALE). Make it 11 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Illinois suggests 11 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. I make that suggestion because I have an important committee meeting.

Mr. HALE. Then I will move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to make that motion before the request for unanimous consent is disposed of?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. By no manner of means. Let us have the unanimous consent agreement first. The motion is made, and that takes precedence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was attempting to understand from the Senator who had the floor, if the Senator from Indiana will permit the Chair to do so, what his intention was. The Chair was undertaking to understand what the Senator from Maine wanted to do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was trying myself to understand it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thought he had a right to understand, so that he could put the motion. The Chair still thinks so.

Mr. HALE. I move, first, that when the Senate adjourns to-day—at the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois and the chairmen of other committees—that it be to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock. I shall follow that by a motion for recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. [Putting the question.]

Mr. CARTER and others addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is not debatable.

Mr. CARTER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CARTER. Was the request for unanimous consent, as stated by the Chair, acceded to by the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not. It has not yet been acceded to.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Chair if any objection was interposed; and if so, by whom?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No objection has yet been interposed, but the Senator from Maine had stated, as the Chair understood, that until this other motion was put, he would not accede to the request. Did the Chair correctly understand the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. The Chair is entirely correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now, the Chair will put the other request, if Senators will permit.

Mr. HALE. Yes; that is right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Which is that at 1.30 to-morrow a vote be taken, without further debate, upon Senate resolution 315, known as the Lorimer resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I hope if Senators are going to object, instead of arguing the case, they will object. We ought to know where we are.

Mr. STONE. I do not intend to argue it, although I might do so, following the example of my distinguished friend, the Senator from Maine, when he was on the floor.

Mr. HALE. I have not argued anything; I am trying to do business.

Mr. STONE. I do not mean to argue it. I desire to say again that I have no objection whatever to agreeing to vote on the Lorimer case at 1.30 to-morrow, with the understanding that no other business, save speech making, such as has been indicated, will be transacted until the Senate meets at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. That assurance has been given to me, so that I am entirely satisfied.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As thus modified——

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not so understand the situation. I do not know of any arrangement or agreement by which if the Senate meets at 8 o'clock it is limited to speech making.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is none.

Mr. CUMMINS. I certainly would not accede to any such suggestion as that. When the Senate comes together it can do as it pleases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Except as to a matter about which it had made an agreement. Of course that would have to be voted upon at the hour agreed upon. It could be voted upon neither before nor later. Is there objection?

Mr. STONE. Now, what is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is that at 1.30 to-morrow, without further debate, a vote be taken upon Senate resolution 315. Is there objection?

Mr. STONE. I said I would not object if it is modified as I indicated—that no other business, except the making of speeches, in case of a recess, shall be transacted prior to 11 o'clock to-morrow, the hour to which the Senate has agreed to adjourn.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I think nobody will object to that.

Mr. CARTER. I inquire whether it is the understanding of the Senator that no business will be transacted during the remainder of the session after the recess—that is, during the evening?

Mr. HALE. That is the understanding.

Mr. CARTER. And the question of the time at which the recess shall be taken is still, of course, in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. I do not quite understand.

Mr. CARTER. Of course there will be a remnant of the session which will convene after the recess at 8 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to make a statement to the Senate. It was the intention of the Chair to recognize some Senator, if this agreement were made, to move to take up some matter, which should be the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. That is what I supposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not wish the Senate to misunderstand the Chair. Senators can agree to whatever they choose, certainly. But the Chair thought he ought to tell the Senate what his intention was.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to know whether I correctly understand the request of the Senator from Missouri for a modification. Is it that if a recess is taken until 8 o'clock no business shall be transacted after 8 o'clock and before adjournment except the making of speeches?

Mr. HALE. It is.

Mr. CARTER. Is that the full extent of the Senator's request?

Mr. STONE. That there shall be no business transacted.

Mr. CARTER. During the evening session?

Mr. STONE. During this session or the evening session at any time prior to 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. STONE. In other words, what I desire to be understood as saying is this: That I think it is the intention of some Senator to move to take up some other bill, probably the tariff commission bill—that is the one I apprehend the motion would apply to—and to make it the unfinished business. I would prefer to have it done when the Senate meets at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. I think it will speed public business if this consent is given that the vote shall be taken at 1.30 to-morrow, without further debate, and that no business except the making of speeches shall be transacted at the evening session.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Do not put in that last request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CUMMINS. I object to that.

Mr. PENROSE. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not object to the request as preferred by the Senator from Michigan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the request which was stated by the Chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. The request, as I understood, as modified by the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, however, was that——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not been asked to put any modified request. The Chair has simply put the request that the Chair was asked to put. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. LODGE. Will the Chair restate the request?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; restate it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is that at 1.30 to-morrow, without further debate, a vote be taken upon Senate resolution 315.

Mr. STONE. Does the Chair think it proper to couple first the——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will couple anything that he is requested to couple. He has not yet been requested to couple anything.

Mr. STONE. I will prefer the request to the Chair to amend that request to this effect—with the understanding that no business will be transacted during this session or the recess session this evening.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before adjournment to-day covers it.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Well, before adjournment to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will again put the request—that at 1.30 to-morrow a vote be taken, without further debate, upon Senate resolution 315, and that during the session of to-day—this legislative day—no business other than debate be transacted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I must object to that.

Mr. PENROSE. I object to the latter part of that proposed agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. PENROSE. I withdraw my objection. I misunderstood the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa objected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to be understood in the matter. The Senator from Maine withdrew his motion to adjourn so that a motion could be made to proceed to the consideration of any other business that it may be thought wise to take up and have that matter determined now. I will not object to confining the session this evening to addresses made by Senators who desire to address the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I am willing to leave that entirely to the Senate. For the present I withdraw my motion for a recess this evening.

Mr. STONE. The motion that when we adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request as stated by the Chair, or does the Senator from Iowa request some modification of it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. The Senator, as I understood it, asked me to withdraw my request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks he can state it as he understands the Senator from Iowa to request it—that at 1.30 to-morrow, without further debate, a vote be taken upon Senate resolution 315; that after the taking of a recess this afternoon no business be transacted prior to adjournment on this legislative day other than addresses.

Mr. KEAN. Except a motion to——

Mr. CUMMINS. I do object to the combined request. I state again my position.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was trying to state what the Senator requested.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the request made by the Senator from Michigan can be put without any accompaniment I shall not object to it, and if then a motion can be entertained to proceed to the consideration of some other matter which the Senate may desire to take up——

Mr. HALE. What other matter?

Mr. CUMMINS. And that motion is disposed of, I will not then object to the request made by the Senator from Missouri that the evening session be devoted to addresses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Exclusively to addresses.

Mr. LODGE. If the request of the Senator from Michigan had been agreed to as he made it, without additions, it was my intention to move to proceed to the consideration of the tariff-commission bill. If that motion should be adopted, I should then make no objection, and I do not think anyone else would, to confining the rest of the day to speeches and addresses.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Massachusetts has stated in terms the matter I had in mind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will again put the request.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest that both Senators can not make that motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not attempted to make any motion. I simply made an objection to the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the original request of the Senator from Michigan that at 1.30 to-morrow, without further debate, the Senate take a vote upon Senate resolution 315?

Mr. STONE. I prefer a request of this kind: That the vote be taken at the time indicated, at 1.30 to-morrow, and that as soon as that consent of the Senate is obtained the motion which the Senator proposes to offer may be made to-night, and then the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will put it that way. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent to modify the request of the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Missouri state the request?

Mr. LODGE. The Chair was about to state it. It is that at 1.30 to-morrow, without further debate, the Senate take a vote on Senate resolution 315; that following the entering into of this agreement the Chair recognize some person to move to consider some other bill; and that when that motion is carried the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock—did the Senator say?

Mr. STONE. Eleven o'clock.

Mr. BAILEY. We have already agreed that when we adjourn it be until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been agreed that when the Senate adjourns it be until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is entered.

TARIFF BOARD.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the sideration of the bill (H. R. 32010) to create a tariff board.

Mr. BAILEY. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I notice that the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is absent. So I withhold my vote, having a general pair with him. Were he present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. He being absent, I will withhold my vote. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. TALIAFERRO's name was called). I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO] is unavoidably absent and that he is paired with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT]. If the Senator from Florida were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BACON (when Mr. TERRELL's name was called). I again announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TERRELL] on account of personal illness. I understand that he is paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], and I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). I inquire whether the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. BACON. I have a pair with that Senator. In his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BAILEY. Perhaps it is shown by the announcement of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]; but in case it is not, I desire the RECORD to show that if the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] were present he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—54.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 1, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1911.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was approved.

CANCELLATION OF SIGNATURE TO JOINT RESOLUTION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the cancellation of his signature to Senate joint resolution 145, providing for the filling of the vacancy which will occur on March 1, 1911, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress, in accordance with the order of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 10883. An act authorizing the Erie Railroad Co. to construct a canal connecting the Hackensack River and Berrys Creek, Bergen County, N. J., as an aid to navigation, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 29360) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 31856, making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1912, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement by the managers on the part of the House may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 31856) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following conference report on the bill (H. The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

MOSES E. CLAPP,
P. J. MCCUMBER,
WM. J. STONE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. What is the effect of the report?

The SPEAKER. These are the only matters in difference between the House and the Senate.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There are three disagreements.

The SPEAKER. Otherwise the whole matter is closed up?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Then the only matter in difference, as the Chair gathers, between the House and the Senate are the three amendments referred to?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I move to further insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman yields will he state the points in disagreement and what they are?

Mr BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I will state that amendment No. 46 is an amendment which provides legislation in favor of certain traders upon the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in North Dakota. When the report of the conferees was before the House on the 17th instant I discussed quite fully that amendment, and I understand that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] desires to make some remarks directed to it.

The second amendment in disagreement has reference to making it possible for certain settlers in Uinta Indian Reservation, in Utah, to acquire patents to their lands without regard to compliance with the homestead laws as to residence.

The third refers to the withholding of $100,000 to the Colville Indians in Washington for the purpose of recognizing a claim that some parties have against these Indians that we think is without merit and which I will discuss before a vote is had upon this motion.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, each of the three items involved in this report was before this House on the 17th of February, when a similar report was presented for the consideration of the House. The item referring to the $100,000 belonging to the Colville Indians received a rather full consideration and debate. Amendment No. 48, which is the one upon which I wish to say a few words, was briefly touched upon and dismissed. In view of the fact that the other branch of this legislative body seems inclined to insist upon each of these three amendments, perhaps it is well that the House be fully advised as to their character and importance. That amendment which relates to the Standing Rock Indian traders, if enacted into law, would cause this Congress to depart upon an entirely new theory and new practice in reference to adjusting the affairs of Indians with Indian traders. The purpose of this is plain upon its face. It provides that the Interior Department shall constitute its Indian agent at Standing Rock Agency a collection agent for the benefit of these traders. It would enforce the payment by the Indians of such sums as may be found due by the agent, and from this decree the Indian has no appeal. Before we embark upon such a method of handling Indian affairs I think we should be fully advised as to whither it will lead us. Questions in controversy between Indian traders and the Indians have existed almost from the earliest history of our Indian affairs. We have tried various expedients to have justice done to the traders and to see that injustice was not done to the Indians. We have met with but indifferent success. Payment of debts and alleged debts have nearly always been enforced, and the Indian has been left to vent his feelings in impotent rage. Human ingenuity has gone far in the effort to secure ample protection to the trader, but for the first time we are asked to create in the Interior Department a judicial tribunal for the purpose of determining the amounts alleged to be due and then enforcing their payment. Beyond doubt, the purpose of this amendment is to empower the agent to ascertain any sums alleged to be due for supplies to these traders, and also to empower him to enforce their collection. A remarkable power to give an Indian agent! He would become the court and the sheriff, and from his decree there would be no appeal. The item also provides that the office of collector, on the part of the agent, shall be a continuing one. Not only is he to pay such Indian funds as are in his possession at the time he finds the debt due, but he is to apply future sums as they come into his possession.

As property in the hands of the Government belonging to the debtor Indians is converted into cash and in the process of being turned over to them, then the agent is to deduct 25 or more per cent upon each contemplated payment and place it in the hands of these traders, until the full amount of the debt is discharged. It seems to me this is all radically and fundamentally wrong. When before did we ever think—what right have we now to think—of conferring upon an Indian agent all the powers of a petty court and an executing officer of the law? What right have we to confer upon such a person the power to take testimony, determine what the evidence is, and then execute his decree? We will make of each of these Indian agents a despot who will have a court of his own and a capacity for evil, as well as good, that is repugnant to every sense of justice.

Mr. BUTLER. Any appeal?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There is no appeal, absolutely. We place in the hands of these Indian agents the power which, if it should go into unworthy hands, would be most disastrous to the welfare of the Indians and most disreputable to the Government. I for one do not think we ought to take such a step. It seems to me we have forgotten a little bit of our history. These Indians that are to be treated in this way are descendants or relatives of those Sioux who went upon the warpath about a half century ago, men who suffered from the insatiate greed of Indian traders till their savage natures were whipped into a fury that only blood could satisfy. That old-time difficulty we are now asked to reinstate and give to it an added sting. Then we gave the traders extraordinary opportunities to collect their accounts; now we are gratuitously to collect the debts and turn the amount over to the traders. What a favored class these creditors would become! How popular would become their trade! Payment being thus assured, traders would sell these Indians every conceivable article, useless and worthless. Under the old-time conditions traders sold these very Indians, for large sums, articles that were ridiculous in nature and practically without value. All the old, broken-down buggies, wagons, and carts in St. Paul were once collected and sold to these very Indians. The supply running short, a worn-out hearse was brought forth and sold at a great price. This hearse was black. Some other Indian bought a white one, and all duly celebrated with the white man's fire water, piled their wives and children into the hearses, and dragged them in joyful glee across the prairie.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. What is the status of these Indians with reference to intelligence?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. These Indians, I presume, are nearly all full bloods, and they have a fair degree of intelligence for that class of Indians. It is pretty hard to say. As Indians go, the country over, I think they are a little above the average intelligence for full bloods, but they are what we call blanket Indians.

Mr. FERRIS. How much of the land is settled up in that reservation?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. As to that I am not able to speak. The chairman of the committee might say.

Mr. FERRIS. I know a good deal of the workings of traders, and the suggestion I wanted to make was, if this land is practically all settled up, I think we ought to do away with the traders altogether rather than to retain them for any purpose.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to say to the gentleman that no part of this reservation, except a very small portion on the south side, has been open to settlement.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. What is the method by which these claims are prosecuted and collected now?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. At the present time?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The system has been that the Indian and the trader get at some sort of an understanding, and when pay day comes the trader is there and the Indian pays him. I want to say that the Indian generally pays his debts.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Has there been any particular abuse arising out of the present practice?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No; not of late years.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I notice the gentleman's committee reported in a bill the other day to pay to an old Indian trader, who has been out of business 20 years or so, the amounts that were due him from the time he went out of business. What is the difference between that proposition and this proposition?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman has not manifested in this instance his usual clearness and penetration of vision. If he will read the report he will find that under the substitute bill reported by the committee neither the trader nor his heirs can collect a farthing.

Mr. MANN. I have read it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am going to call his attention to a feature of the report. If he will read it he will find that if any sums are found due the Secretary may pay them out of any funds now in the Government's hands belonging to the individual debtor Indians. There are no such funds, so nothing can be collected. It was a left-handed way of killing the bill. I wish also to say that there is an adverse report on that bill, flatly and squarely opposing any apparent intent to pay such claims under any conditions. So that substitute bill contemplates only this, that there shall be an investigation made, and in case there is found due from Indians now living any sums to that trader, that those sums, if they are in the hands of the Government, may be paid over; but I will say to the gentleman, and we can both smile——

Mr. MANN. On all fours with this proposition?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that we all know that not one farthing can be collected under that bill.

Mr. MANN. Then why did the gentleman's committee report it? I am glad the gentleman and I agree on this bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I wish to speak a little further in respect to one point not yet mentioned, Mr. Speaker, I think, in the debate on this question. If we confer this authority on the Government in respect to this Standing Rock Agency, we are giving these traders a right not enjoyed at any time past and not now, and will not be by any other traders elsewhere in the United States. We can not possibly enact legislation of this character, which will be class legislation of the strongest kind in behalf of these few traders at this agency, and ignore the situation elsewhere throughout the United States. But if we do, Mr. Speaker, establish a precedent at this time, at the next and succeeding sessions of this House I can see that we will have a flood of traders thronging the corridors asking for similar legislation to be effective throughout the United States, and I am quite sure the membership of this House does not want to embark upon any such program as that. And one thing more, Mr. Speaker. By a general law which is now upon the statute books, there is a full, ample measure of relief accorded in circumstances of this kind; and I will say further that although it was after the incurring of most of this indebtedness, there has been in existence a rule of the department that any trader trading with the Indians must do so at his own peril.

He extends credit to the Indians themselves, and does not do so on the faith of the Government of the United States or its guaranty that it will secure the payment of the debt. Notices of this kind were sent throughout the country and were posted up at the different agencies in order that they could be looked at, so that the traders must know there, as elsewhere, that when they are dealing with Indians they are dealing with the Indians as individuals and must not expect to collect the indebtedness through the Government.

Now, it is only fair to say—and I am sorry that the gentleman from North Dakota is not here at this hour; perhaps he will be here before we are through—that these Indians are well off. Many families are worth all the way from $10,000 to $75,000, and they ought to pay their debts. But they will pay their debts, and if they do not, those debts can be collected in the usual way. We have no disposition to encourage dishonesty among the Indians or looseness in their business affairs.

But, if you are going to civilize the Indians—and that it seems to me should be the object of legislation here—we should put them upon the same footing as other citizens of the country, financially as well as otherwise. You can never do that by paying their debts for them and thereby failing to inculcate habits of industry and thrift on their part.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman be good enough to answer another question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. What meaning does the gentleman attach to this language, That in the event the first 25 per cent shall not be sufficient and the "amount due the Indian shall be sufficient, in the judgment of the superintendent, to pay a greater amount of said indebtedness," and so forth, the "superintendent shall use his influence to secure the payment of the whole?" To what extent does that confer authority upon the superintendent? And to what extent does he exercise it?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think that should properly be pronounced "influocence." [Laughter.] The gentleman has called attention to a very dangerous situation, right there, which this law would create. The influence of the trader with the Indians may be exerted in a thousand ways, perhaps in nine hundred and ninety-nine of them not proper ways.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there are three Senate amendments to this bill which the conferees have refused to accede to. Amendment No. 48 has just been referred to by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]. I do not believe that we should now enter upon the policy of making the United States a collecting agency for the benefit of Indian traders, who have claims against Indians. Would any Member of this House vote for a bill making the United States Government a collection agency for the collection of debts in this city—by garnishment or otherwise—from clerks or other employees of the Government by withholding their monthly salaries? In the State of Texas, as well as in other States of the Union, the State governments do not guarantee the debts of employees. We should remember that the amount of money coming to these Indians is in most cases annuities, and it is all that they have to live upon from day to day. The same is true of the wage-earning clerks and employees all over the country, and no Government has ever dared to deprive them of the scanty income due them as wages. In the case of these Indian reservations the traders have a monopoly of the mercantile trade with the Indians, and it is well known they frequently charge two or three times as much for the goods they sell to the Indians as they are worth. There is some reason for these high prices, when we consider that they run the risk of not getting their money from the Indians. They are trading with children, as it were, because Indians are the wards of the Government. We can not afford to take the money that is coming to them, and upon which they live, to pay on old questioned debts, and leave them nothing with which to buy clothing or food or whatever else they must buy.

The next item of disagreement with the Senate is No. 82, in reference to the Colville Indian Reservation, one-half of which was sold several years ago. The last payment is now due and amounts to $300,000. The House passed a bill several years ago to pay these Indians for the north half of the Colville Reservation the sum of $1,500,000.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There was a claim put forward by attorneys for these Indians for $90,000 of these funds.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the gentleman what amendment is that?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is amendment No. 82. The gentleman will see that this Senate amendment strikes out "$300,000" and inserts "$200,000." The object of that amendment does not appear on the face of the amendment, but the object of it is simply that this $100,000 shall be withheld from the Indians for the purpose of enabling these attorneys to collect the $90,000 they claim to be due them by the Indians. That fee should not be paid, because the matter is res adjudicata in my judgment. Several years ago Congress submitted this matter of attorneys' fees to the Court of Claims, and the Court of Claims found that there was due to these attorneys only $60,000, instead of $150,000, as claimed by them.

That decision stands to-day. It has never been appealed from, and Congress can not afford to send these Indians to court again and retry this case. The court by its decree found that this $90,000 belongs to the Indians, and we can not go back upon the order of that court and take the $90,000 from the Indians and redistribute it among attorneys.

Then, again, the very act of Congress that submitted these claims for fees to the court states that the amount decreed the attorneys should be received by them in full payment of all demands for those attorneys' fees. Now, after they have received the money and given their receipts in full for all fees due them as named by the decree of the court—which decree names the amount of money that each one was entitled to—they are estopped by law or in equity from claiming any more money on these fees. The decree of the Court of Claims required each and every one of these lawyers to give a receipt in full of all demands against the Indians. Now we are asked by this amendment to repudiate these receipts and to leave $100,000 out of this bill so that these attorneys may have another chance to redistribute it among themselves. Mr. Speaker, I never can consent to this amendment of the Senate, for the reasons I have stated.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word with reference to amendment No. 82, to which the gentleman from Texas has just addressed himself, and which was very fully discussed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] on the 17th of February, when this matter was before the House on a former occasion.

This proposition, as has been stated, is to withhold from payment the sum of $100,000 out of $300,000 that is due the Colville Indians.

The purpose of withholding this money is to lay a foundation for a claim for attorneys' fees in connection with securing the legislation by which a claim of $1,500,000 was appropriated several years ago.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, as has already been stated, that that claim grows out of the matter of the cession of one-half of the Colville Indian Reservation, in Washington, for which the Indians were to receive $1,500,000.

When that treaty was ratified Congress assumed that the Indians had no rights for which the Government ought to compensate them, and, therefore, struck out of that treaty the provision to pay them $1,500,000 that they had been promised. That was in 1892.

A contract was made with a firm of attorneys here in Washington, one Gordon and one Maish, by which they were to have 10 per cent of whatever they might receive as a fee for their services in obtaining from the Government this $1,500,000.

That contract was limited to 10 years. About the time the contract expired, or just before it expired, this firm of Gordon & Maish entered into a contract with the firm of Butler & Vail, of this city. Butler & Vail were to prosecute this case, to represent Gordon & Maish, and were to receive for their services three-fifteenths of whatever Messrs. Gordon & Maish might receive under their contract.

After the expiration of the contract, whatever service was rendered was rendered, as shown by the record, on a basis of quantum meruit. An examination of the record in the Court of Claims discloses that one of these attorneys, when testifying, stated not only once, but repeatedly, that he was not appearing under any contract, but was simply appearing on a basis of quantum meruit.

If I had time, Mr. Speaker, I would quote the evidence to show that there was no doubt, and that there was no uncertainty about how these attorneys were to get their compensation, if they ever got any for their services. Later, in an Indian appropriation bill, the $1,500,000 was set aside in the Treasury to the credit of these Indians in recognition of their claims. These attorneys claimed 10 per cent of that amount, or $150,000. While the Indian appropriation bill was in conference an item was agreed to by which the question of the attorneys' fees was to be submitted to the Court of Claims, to be determined by that court on a quantum meruit basis. All the several attorneys who claimed to have any interest went into the court, the case was fully heard, it was argued at length, and finally the court decided that the attorneys were entitled to $60,000. The jurisdictional act provided that before the amount should be distributed to the attorneys they should file a receipt in full.

Mr. Speaker, the attorneys who are the most active now in trying to revive this claim have filed a receipt in full and have received the amount of the court's award.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman has already said that the Court of Claims fixed the compensation at $60,000. Has that been paid?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes; with the exception of two or three small amounts that the claimants are wrangling about, and I believe a receiver has been appointed, and the matter is in court to determine how it shall be divided.

Mr. KEIFER. Did the law authorize the payment of the $60,000, or only a part of it?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The whole $60,000, and made an apportionment, dividing the amount among the several attorneys. I may say that the attorneys, Butler & Vail, received according to this award $30,000, which happened to be precisely what their contract provided, to wit, three-tenths of $150,000. Now, under the provision that was offered in another body it was proposed to pay this firm of attorneys $45,000 more.

Mr. KEIFER. Was not there some provision in the findings that this was only a partial finding?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Absolutely nothing of the kind.

Mr. KEIFER. Was not there a reservation of further consideration of the matter?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Absolutely none whatever.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will allow me, Maj. Gordon, a most estimable gentleman, and son of Senator John B. Gordon, was interested in this. He was one of the original contractors.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. And he claims that as far as he was concerned he took this amount because he had to do it, and that there was no final adjudication under his contract or the quantum meruit.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Ohio is in error. Maj. Gordon intervened in the Court of Claims, and his claim was adjudicated, the same as the other claims, and he was awarded the sum of $14,000, which, in my judgment, was ample compensation for the actual services that he may have rendered.

Mr. KEIFER. It was not the equivalent of the contract price that he had.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The contract had long since expired. The contract was made in 1894, and was for a 10-year period.

Mr. KEIFER. Was it not executed?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. On whose part?

Mr. KEIFER. On the part of those who agreed to serve the Indians.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly not; a large part of whatever was done was done after the expiration of that contract.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, I listened with much surprise to what the gentleman from Texas said. Does the gentleman from South Dakota say that all of the attorneys agreed to prosecute the suit on a quantum meruit?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The firm of Butler & Vail claimed that they had a private agreement by which all the attorneys agreed that they, Butler & Vail, would go into the Court of Claims, and whatever was recovered was to be divided on a quantum meruit.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And the contract was left out?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The contract was left out, and I may say that some of these claimants apparently lost confidence in Butler & Vail and were afraid that perhaps they would not get their portion, and so they intervened, and among them this Mr. Gordon, to whom the gentleman from Ohio has referred, and the whole matter was discussed and adjudicated.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One question more. During the progress of the litigation, when it was before the court for hearing and trial, did the various lawyers attend court in person or by their attorneys and present testimony?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Why certainly, they not only testified, but were represented by counsel and arguments were submitted.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So then it amounts to this: Upon that hearing both sides presented testimony and the court found on the quantum meruit these men were entitled to a certain sum.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And they filed receipts in full for that?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And now they come in and ask for how much more?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Ninety thousand dollars.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well I am very glad to know that we have conferees on the part of the House who will stand out against such a thing.

Mr. KEIFER. They are not asking you to fix $90,000.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then there can be no question whatever about the purpose of this amendment, and any gentleman who is in doubt about the purpose, if he will consult the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and particularly the proceedings in another body, will find exactly what the purpose of it is. It can have no other purpose. These Indians were kept out of their money for about 14 or 15 years. Now, we are paying them $300,000 a year. The judgment of this court was rendered in May, 1908. We have gone on appropriating $300,000 each year, the $1,500,000 to be paid in five annual installments, and now when we are about to pay them the last amount, along comes this claim, something that no person had any idea would ever be brought up.

Mr. KEIFER. Another question. I understand that the proposition is to reserve $100,000, not to pay this claim until there is an adjudication of the claim. Is not that true?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, that may be the contention, but I maintain that there is no claim.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the gentleman's contention, but these people claim they have an unadjudicated claim. They do not claim this $100,000 or $90,000, but that they should have the right, before you make the final disposition of it, to further adjudicate their claim.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It has already been finally adjudicated.

Mr. KEIFER. That is disputed.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In 1906, when this matter was sent to the Court of Claims, it was fully discussed, and it was stated that the purpose of sending it to the Court of Claims was to settle it, and they did not make any payment in that year—that is, the first installment was not paid, because it was said by those who were upon the conference that they ought to wait until the question for services was settled and determined.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make just one concluding statement in regard to this matter.

This proposition is indefensible from the point of view of either law or equity. It can be defended—if defense can be justified in any event—only on the theory that this procedure is in the nature of an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Claims. But I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, no reputable lawyer will contend that it can be defended on such theory. The decree of the court was entered nearly three years ago. The attorneys chiefly concerned in the matter promptly applied for and received their share of the award, to wit, one half of $60,000. They gave their receipts in full satisfaction of all claims and demands upon the Indians for their services in this case. Since that time three installments of $300,000 each have been appropriated, and up to the present time it has never been suggested that the claims had not been fully, conclusively, and finally adjusted by that decree of May 25, 1908. The claim has never been presented to the Committee on Indian Affairs or to this House through any other committee. Not until after the last installment due the Indians had been appropriated by this House, and not until the eleventh hour of the consideration of this bill in the Senate, did we have any knowledge or intimation that another claim had been trumped up against these Indians. The proposition now before this House is in violation of every principle of square dealing with both the Indians and the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to leave any opportunity for doubt as to my position on this proposition, nor do I propose, so far as in my power lies, to leave the record of this case in such an uncertain condition as to permit it to be claimed at any future time that by any act of the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House, or of the House conferees on the Indian bill, this House has admitted there is any shadow of equity in this proposition to withhold $100,000, or any other amount from this fifth and last payment due the Indians. To recognize this alleged claim and pay any amount would be to despoil and defraud the Indians and encourage these lobbyists to continue their wrangle over a division of a fund which by courtesy only can be called "fees."

Mr. Speaker, much has been said in deprecation of muckraking and muckrakers, but I want to go on record in this connection as saying that if such an iniquitous proposition as this can be successfully advanced through Congress to plunder the helpless wards of the Nation, then we are deliberately furnishing material that needs the application of the muckrake to keep the atmosphere of the National Capitol in a sanitary condition. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, there are three items in disagreement, two of which have been discussed, and one of which has not been discussed. I do not think it will be proper to have the matter passed upon without a very brief discussion of the item which proposes to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to grant patents to certain homesteaders in the Unitah Indian Reservation.

The amendment in the form in which it appears should not be agreed to. The House conferees are not willing to agree to it as I understand, and they certainly should be upheld in their position. In its present form the amendment is certainly not good legislation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, what is the question?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to further insist on the disagreement of the House to the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the question, so that we may have a separate vote on amendment No. 82.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for a division and a separate vote on amendment No. 82. The question is on the motion to disagree and further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendments Nos. 47 and 76.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to further disagree to Senate amendment No. 82.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 210, noes 0. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment No. 82, page 51, line 2, after the word "one" strike out "three" and insert "two," so it will read "$200,000."

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House consent to the request of the Senate for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced the following conferees:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, Mr. CAMPBELL, and Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

SHERIDAN RAILWAY & LIGHT CO., ETC.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed to submit the following conference report on the bill S. 9903.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman submits a conference report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 9903) to authorize the Sheridan Railway & Light Co. to construct and operate a railway, telegraph, telephone, electric power and trolley lines through the Fort Mackenzie Military Reservation.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 9903) to authorize the Sheridan Railway & Light Co. to construct and operate railway, telegraph, telephone, electric power, and trolley lines through the Fort Mackenzie Military Reservation, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same.

The question was taken, and the conference report was adopted.

CERTAIN RIGHTS OF WAY, FORT D. A. RUSSELL MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following conference report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 9904) granting certain rights of way on the Fort D. A. Russell Military Reservation, at Cheyenne, Wyo., for railroad and county road purposes.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 9904) granting certain rights of way on the Fort D. A. Russell Military Reservation, at Cheyenne, Wyo., for railroad and county road purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

J. A. T. HULL,
F. C. STEVENS,
JAMES HAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. E. WARREN,
M. G. BULKELEY,
JAS. P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The House recedes from its amendment, and I move that the conference report be adopted.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is that the bill in which there was an amendment to amend, alter, and repeal——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; I will say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Minnesota and other members of the committee have gone over this very carefully. It gives something less than an acre of land across the corner of a large military reservation as a right of way for the road, and if the entire amount was given to the road in fee there would be no damage whatever to the Government. It is a very small matter, and the main right is given the people for a wagon road.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as I recall it, this is a bill which concluded with a provision reserving to the Secretary of War the right to revoke a license to the railroad company, while, as a matter of fact, the bill itself before the proviso contained a provision which construed the first part of the bill to be a grant to the railroad company and not a license at all. I remember I called attention to the item, and the gentleman from Iowa promptly accepted an amendment by which Congress reserved the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act, the usual reservation in bills of that kind. It is not a license for this railroad company to go upon a military reservation, and that license is to be revokable at the discretion of the Secretary of War, but it was a straight-out grant, and so interpreted by the bill itself. Not only that, but the word "grant" was used so far as the county is concerned, and there was a conflict to that extent, and inasmuch as that amendment was so promptly accepted, and inasmuch as the railroad company and everybody else knows that the Congress will not do any wrong by that reservation to alter, amend, or repeal the right to go into the military reservation, I do not think we ought to recede from that amendment so promptly without an explanation.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, Mr. Speaker, Congress has repeatedly given railroads across reservations the right to construct and establish a right of way. We did it through a reservation in Oklahoma, and we have done it repeatedly for others. This is a very small fraction of land that the War Department itself concedes is of no value to the Government as a part of the reservation, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has examined the maps and is thoroughly familiar with it. I only want to say in addition, before yielding to him, that this bill, with this amendment eliminated, will meet the approval of the department, do no harm to the country, and will facilitate the construction of a great work of public improvement.

I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] in that the rule he lays down should be adopted as a general proposition. And I would not agree to this bill, except that it seems to be such an exceptional case, and I am glad to place the facts concerning it of record in the House, so that it shall not be adopted hereafter as a precedent against the wholesome, general rule advocated by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The tract of land affected is about a quarter of a mile long, and in width contains a county road and the usual right of way for a railroad, and so is about 150 feet wide. This tract lies in a low swamp in the extreme southwest corner of the military reservation, which is not needed under any circumstances for military purposes, as is evident from the map of the reservation, and is so reported by the War Department. The right of way for the railroad and county road, owing to the swampy condition of the land affected, will be obliged to be constructed upon an embankment about 40 feet high, which will have to be filled across this low swamp. Under these circumstances both the county and the railroad state that they could not well construct such a permanent work upon a mere license. This proposition is not merely a right of way across the reservation.

It is of no value at all, except by the permanent use by filling of a strip about 150 feet wide by about a quarter of a mile long across that swamp which is not needed or will not be needed under any circumstances for military purposes. It is clearly of advantage to the reservation to have the county road and the railroad properly constructed and ready for use, and it is certainly of benefit to the public to have both of these constructed. Under this condition this seems to be such an exception that it is wise in this instance for the House to adopt—to recede from the amendment it made to the Senate bill and grant this portion of land for the highway and right of way as required by the county and the railroad company. For that reason I agreed, as conferee, to recede from the amendment of the House.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will not this be cited as a precedent?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No, Mr. Speaker. That is why I desired to place clearly on record the reason why this is an exception, and such an exception that has never before come under my notice since I have been a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman think that by the enactment of this into law we will make the whole question hereafter one simply of presenting testimony as to the value of the land to be granted? Every bill of this kind should expressly reserve to Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal. That is a practice which ought unswervingly to be adhered to. But by this bill in its present form we propose, as I have said, to make the whole question as to whether land shall be given away by Congress turn on testimony as to the value of the land. We will not only forsake a principle and a practice of vast importance to the Government, but we will establish an exceedingly troublesome precedent.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The War Department reports, and the map shows, that this land is not necessary and never can be used for military purposes, and its best and, indeed, only use is for such as we have granted, for public highways. It is a little triangle in the corner that is not included in the main body of the reservation, and is of such a character and location that it can never be of any use or value. But the highway and railroad over it are very much more valuable.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me to make another suggestion?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Originally the railroad company was willing to accept the bill with the proviso allowing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to revoke what was called the license. It was called a license in the bill which the railroad company had agreed to accept, and which was presented to the House a few days ago by the gentleman from Iowa.

I then pointed out that it was not a license, but a straight grant to the railroad company and also to the county, and that the proviso contradicted the grant, and I proposed an amendment which was adopted by the House, by which the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act was expressly reserved. The gentleman from Iowa accepted the amendment. But now he opposes the amendment providing that Congress may alter, amend, or repeal, and declares that he is not willing to accept it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion? The gentleman from Wisconsin has in mind the other bill where a conference report was agreed to, which includes the right to alter, amend, or repeal. The bill that is now before the House did not include the provision which the gentleman refers to. That was in the other bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman the bill there?

Mr. MANN. I have the bill right here.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Wisconsin, and possibly the House, does not understand just the situation with regard to this grant. There is a sharp triangle running down from Fort D. A. Russell——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am right. They have stricken out the proviso.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to have the gentleman's attention. There is a sharp triangle running down from Fort D. A. Russell, and they seek a right of way for a county road along the side of this triangle. The amount of land which the railroad takes is, as I recollect, but a fraction of an acre. The county road takes a strip about 150 feet wide along the edge of this triangle.

It is on the extreme edge of the reservation where, as I say, this triangle runs down, and it is proposed to take along the edge of that triangle a narrow strip for a county road, with an area of a fraction of an acre which the railroad takes at one point. Now there is no earthly reason why the title should not be a fee. The public is obtaining the land for a county road. It is not needed and can not be used for military purposes. The railroad line does not even run onto the reservation. The very small tract which the railroad receives a grant to, a small fraction of an acre, is simply a place where they have to make a heavy fill on a curve; and inasmuch as this land is being transferred for a public purpose, it seems to me there ought to be no objection to the grant being in fee.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think the gentleman is absolutely right.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, if the gentleman from Wyoming is through.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, then I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. This grant, with the exception of a small part, is for a public use, for a county road, a necessary county road, and we certainly ought not to do anything more than make the grant in fee where the grant is to the public for a public use. The very small fraction of an acre, which is made necessary by a heavy embankment, granted to the railroad company is so small an area that it seems to me there ought to be no objection to making that also a grant in fee, in view of the fact that it is so far removed from any buildings on the reservation—on this little sharp point that runs down to the southeast corner.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understand this land does not run through the reservation at all.

Mr. MONDELL. No; it does not. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MANN. It runs down to the edge of the triangle and laps over, and it is proposed there to give a little piece for the use of the public road?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; it is for the use of the reservation as much as for the use of the general public, because that county road will be used by people coming down from the Army post. This is one of the largest posts in the country, a brigade post, and that county road is just as necessary for the maintenance of the post as it is for the convenience of the people of the country generally; so that inasmuch as the transfer is for a public purpose, it seems to me it ought to be a transfer in fee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield a half minute to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, there has been such a demand for copies of the Indian appropriation bill with the Senate amendments numbered that the supply has been exhausted. There have also been so many inquiries respecting the present status of the bill that I have prepared for the RECORD copies of the bill as passed by the Senate and as agreed to in conference, which I desire to have printed in parallel columns, in order that it may be seen at a glance precisely what has resulted from the several conferences between the managers on the part of the two branches of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

FORT D. A. RUSSELL MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I was not mistaken as to the character of this bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I at my disposal to yield to the gentleman? How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Five minutes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I was absolutely right in my remarks concerning the contents of this bill when it was first brought before the House. It is true, technically speaking, that the original bill appeared first in the Senate, and did not then contain the proviso; but it is true also that the original Senate bill, when it first came before the House for consideration, did contain the proviso reserving to the Secretary of War the power, in his discretion, to revoke the so-called license.

It was a Senate bill, with that proviso added as an amendment after it came to the House by the committee of which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] himself is chairman.

Now, the bill, line 6, page 1, provides that—

> The Colorado Railroad Co. is hereby authorized to build a line of railroad, etc.

The word "authorized" is used. The language might be construed as a license, it being a mere authorization to construct a railroad line on the military reservation. But near the end of the bill, on page 3, are these words:

> Saving and excepting therefrom that portion of said strip of land hereinbefore, in section 1 of this act, described as granted to the railroad, etc.

But nowhere before in the bill is any land described as granted to the railroad company.

The amendment, which the gentleman from Iowa himself reported, was the proviso, and I was exactly right when I said that it gave to the Secretary of War the power at any time to revoke the license.

But it was not a license. The original bill with the proviso, if enacted into law, would have made a grant in fee. This contradiction was called to the attention of the House, and I moved an amendment reserving to Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act—the customary reservation in bills of this sort. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] said that he was glad to accept the amendment, as did the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. So also, in an undertone, did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. He said that such a reservation ought to be in the bill.

The House promptly adopted the amendment without an objection.

But now these gentlemen declare that they are opposed to having Congress, by this bill, reserve to itself the customary right to alter, amend, or repeal.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They desire this to be an absolute grant. Perhaps no great wrong will be done in this particular case, but it will establish a very bad precedent. Hereafter bills will be brought in without the heretofore usual reservation of the right to alter, amend, or repeal. Absolute grants will be given to railroad companies or other corporations to construct works upon Government reservations, and, as an excuse, the claim will be made, as it is here being made, that the land to be given away is not worth much. This precedent will be cited in support of demands for absolute grants in fee.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me just to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin is entirely mistaken as to the bill. His statement a moment ago was that the original bill contained a provision authorizing the Secretary of War to revoke the license.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have just explained that the original bill was a Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to occupy two minutes? That was his statement a moment ago. I call his attention to the fact that I hold the original bill in my hand, and that no such provision was in the original bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is begging the question.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin says that that is begging the question, but that is the fact. His argument, in the first place, was that the railroad company had itself proposed that they give to the Secretary of War authority to revoke the license and was seeking to eliminate that from the bill. That was his position. He was mistaken about that. The provision to which he refers was an amendment offered and agreed to in the House, and not in the original bill. Whether it ought to be in is another question, but it could not be charged that the company itself is seeking to obtain a permit giving authority to revoke the license, and that is the only point I wish to call to the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin seems to be under the impression that I agreed to the amendment. I certainly did not, further than that as the bill was up for consideration by unanimous consent I had no option in the matter. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this grant, except for less than one-eighth of an acre, is for a county road; that it is not through the military reservation, but along the edge of the military reservation. It is a grant of less than one-eighth of an acre to the railroad company on a little narrow triangle which runs down from the reservation, which has never been occupied for military purposes and can not be occupied for military purposes.

The railroad track does not run on the reservation, but they have to have an embankment on the curve, and it is necessary to give the railroad company one-eighth of an acre for the fill of their embankment. The track is entirely off the reservation. It is necessary to have this county road in order to connect the railroad with the reservation for the benefit of the reservation as well as for the benefit of the citizens. The very small portion that the railroad company receives is but a fragment and upon a triangle far removed from the military use.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman were content to have that proviso reported by the gentleman from Iowa himself calling it a license, and for the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to revoke the license, if the gentleman from Iowa reported that, and was willing to call it a license, and have it revoked at the discretion of the Secretary of War, why do they now insist on striking it out and making it an absolute grant?

Mr. MONDELL. It was a grant in the original bill, although the word "license" may have been used at one point. It was a clear grant, and it ought to be a clear grant, because, with the exception of less than one-eighth of an acre, it is a grant for public purposes, and, as I say, this one-eighth of an acre is far removed from that part of the reservation that can ever be used for military purposes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Military Affairs did report the amendment to which the gentleman from Wisconsin refers, and has always tried to guard these grants in every way possible. The Committee on Military Affairs afterwards came into more information as to all that was required in this case, and made it without any division of sentiment, and were satisfied that no harm could come to the Government by making this in the form that it will be by eliminating our own amendment.

There are 7 acres of this that goes to the people for a public highway, and less than an acre goes to the railroad to enable them to make a curve without throwing their line out of the regular survey. None of it is worth anything to the country as a military reservation, and to make this grant to the people for a public highway and to the railway can not be injurious to the people of the country.

Mr. Speaker, my general experience has been that whenever a reservation is near a city in any part of the country and they want a road in it they get the Government to build all the roads on the reservation on the theory that it is Government ground. It seems to me that we can well afford to encourage these people who are willing to go to the expense of building their own roads across this reservation by ceding this land to them for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

ORGANIZED MILITIA.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report (No. 2275) from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 1001, in lieu of House resolution 978.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider the bill (H. R. 28436) to further increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, and for other purposes with the following amendments:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "or may be hereafter;" page 2, line 22, strike out the words "or may be hereafter;" page 3, strike out lines 23, 24, and 25, and on page 4 strike out, in line 1, the words "otherwise appropriated: Provided;" page 4, line 14, after the word "trial," insert the following words, "on the charge of desertion," and in line 16 strike out the following words, "shall be adjudged guilty of the crime of desertion and," and add a new section, No. 6: "The Secretary of War shall annually estimate the amount necessary for the carrying out of this act, and no money shall be expended hereunder, except as it shall from time to time be appropriated; that there shall be not to exceed one hour's general debate; that at the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read for amendments; and that at the conclusion of the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto to its final passage."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman how much time he will occupy.

Mr. DALZELL. I shall occupy only two or three minutes, and then I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much time will the gentleman give me?

Mr. DALZELL. As much as I occupy myself.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But I want 30 minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Then, I will yield the gentleman 30 minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the House will proceed immediately upon the adoption of this rule to the consideration of the militia bill.

Mr. DALZELL. That is the purpose.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will ask the gentleman to withhold that.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to say to the House that I know of no person on this side of the House who wants to indulge in oratory. I do not propose to speak more than two or three minutes, and when I said the gentleman from Missouri should have 30 minutes it was in my mind that 30 minutes would exhaust the debate, because there is nobody on this side who wants to talk.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair listened to the rule, it provides for the consideration of this bill, without limit, under the five-minute rule in the House or in Committee of the Whole. The Chair desires to call attention to the fact that the deficiency bill is not yet passed. Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania be willing to withhold his report for the present until the deficiency bill is disposed of?

Mr. DALZELL. Why, Mr. Speaker, I will do so, but I think there is a misapprehension as to the time this is going to take.

The SPEAKER. Well, it takes time under the rule, without limit.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no; the Chair is mistaken.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is one hour of general debate provided for.

Mr. DALZELL. The question now is on the adoption of the rule, not on the discussion of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is opposition to this rule, and Members wish to be heard so that they may state their objections to the adoption of the rule as well as to the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the rule provide that we shall take it up immediately on the adoption of the rule?

Mr. DALZELL. It does.

The SPEAKER. Would that not hold the floor?

Mr. DALZELL. It would until it is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. And there is no limit for its disposition under the five-minute rule, is there?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think we can make an agreement about that.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, if the Speaker will recognize me after the disposition of the general deficiency bill to present this rule, I will give way for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws his report for the present.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 32957) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1911 and for prior years, and for other purposes, and that the rules be suspended and the bill passed with two amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules, to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill, and pass the same——

Mr. TAWNEY. With two amendments which accompany the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Will the bill be read?

The SPEAKER. Under the form of the motion it would be unless its reading was dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Will it be subject to points of order?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I reserve all points of order——

Mr. MANN. You can not.

The SPEAKER. All points of order were reserved when the bill went to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. This is a motion to suspend all rules and pass this bill.

Mr. SIMS. Does the first reading take place before the motion or after it?

The SPEAKER. Oh, the first reading of the bill under this motion would be before the adoption of the rule disposing of it.

Mr. SIMS. Before the motion is acted upon. Then I demand the first reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. There is no first reading; it is simply read.

The SPEAKER. It will simply be read, unless its reading be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I want to demand a second on the request of the gentleman from Minnesota to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill, with the proposed amendments.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls attention to the fact that it will take about an hour to an hour and 20 minutes to read the bill. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk proceeded with the further reading of the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KENDALL). The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The Clerk proceeded with the further reading of the bill.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The Clerk proceeded with the further reading of the bill to page 14, line 19——

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on page 14, from line 19 down to and including line 25.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks a point of order can not be entertained at this time, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded with the further reading of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether under the present method of procedure it would be in order to move to strike out or in any way discuss any paragraph of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the bill is now being read for the information of the House to enable the membership to determine whether they will support the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to suspend the rules and place the bill upon its passage with two amendments, and the Chair thinks, therefore, that a motion to strike out or a point of order against any provision would not be in order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the motion of a Member who desires to offer an amendment, or a motion of a Member who desires to strike out any given paragraph would not be in order until the bill is read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Or any other time, is the Chair's opinion on the subject.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, another parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. When the Clerk finishes the reading of the bill, if the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to suspend the rules and pass the bill be adopted, will there be any opportunity then to amend or make points of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. The motion would have to be voted down in order to amend the bill or to make any point of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the opinion of the present occupant of the chair.

The Clerk proceeded with the further reading of the bill.

Mr. SIMS rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, there is an important bill being read, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-four Members are present, a quorum, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded with the further reading of the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, there is no quorum present, and therefore I make a point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] There are 114 Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The doors will be closed, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The roll call discloses the presence of 264 Members of the House—a quorum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

When the Clerk had read to line 5, page 60,

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To make a request for unanimous consent. I would like to print in the RECORD some remarks on the use of barges.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to print remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to withdraw my former motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments that I sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota withdraws his motion.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire, Mr. Speaker, now to renew the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of House bill 32957, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1911 and for prior years, and for other purposes; to suspend the rules and pass the bill without reading, with the amendments that I have sent to the Clerk's desk, together with two additional amendments, which are—

Strike out, on page 14, line 19, and the top of page 15, down to and including line 10.

Also strike out lines 15 and 16 on page 72.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill, H. R. 32957, and dispense with the reading of the bill; to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the following amendments, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. TAWNEY. The first amendment should read "down to and including line 12," instead of "line 10, on page 15."

The Clerk reported the first amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. The next is on page 72.

The Clerk reported the next amendment.

The SPEAKER. Were those the amendments that were reported in the first reading?

Mr. TAWNEY. That amendment was withdrawn. There are now two other amendments.

The Clerk read the remaining two amendments.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is any member of the Committee on Appropriations opposed to this bill?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am not opposed to the bill, but I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of any member of the Committee on Appropriations demanding a second, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], who demands a second. Under the rules a second is ordered. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not take very much time in stating the appropriating provisions carried in this bill. I want to call attention, however, to the fact that the aggregate amount carried in it is $8,060,126.36. That covers the deficiencies for the fiscal year 1911. It also includes a considerable amount that is not deficiencies. If gentlemen will read the report accompanying the bill, they will find that there is $758,888 of that amount in judgments of the United States courts, the Court of Claims, and audited accounts.

In addition to that we have one deficiency in the appropriation for the payment of pensions of $2,500,000. That deficiency, added to the judgments and audited accounts, makes the aggregate $3,258,888, leaving only a little over $4,000,000 of actual deficiencies, and in the statement of $4,000,000 of actual deficiencies is included a few small and new items.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I note on page 62, in line 20—

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, $20,000.

Is the gentleman informed that that will not pay the expenses of those committees whose expenses have been ordered by the House?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that the information which the committee had when this bill was prepared was that $20,000 would be all that was necessary. I understand that since that time there have been very heavy drafts on this miscellaneous appropriation that will have to be made up by increasing this amount; but I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that the Chief Clerk of the House will not be able to give complete information as to the exact amount that will be required to meet all of the demands upon this appropriation, and that if the item goes through as we have reported it I will obtain from the Chief Clerk at the latest possible moment the information as to the exact amount and have that incorporated as an amendment at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That is satisfactory. Will the gentleman allow me to say that at a meeting of the Committee on Accounts to-day we had to audit nearly $4,000 of expenses for one investigating committee, and we know that others have been estimated for, and unless we are mistaken as to the estimates that have been sent in, in addition to those we have already approved, I know this amount will not be sufficient?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the gentleman is entirely correct, and I will say that that will be taken care of before this bill becomes a law.

Mr. Speaker, this showing as to the aggregate deficiency appropriation for the fiscal year 1911 is very gratifying to me and, I think, to the House, in view of what these deficiencies were in previous years, or prior to the amendment of the anti-deficiency law at the beginning of the Fifty-ninth Congress. At that time the departments of the Government fixed the standard of public expenditures, and our deficiencies mounted up to as high as $30,000,000 or $35,000,000 annually; but as the result of the law which was passed at the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, the standard of public expenditure is and must be fixed by the Congress of the United States, and if the departments or the various branches of the Government do not conform to the standard thus fixed, and if they create deficiencies, the responsible officials are liable to imprisonment, as well as removal from office.

As the result of this legislation, therefore, we have in this deficiency bill only about $4,000,000 of deficiencies for the fiscal year 1911, and, including the $700,000 carried in the urgent deficiency bill, the aggregate of the deficiencies for this fiscal year would be less than $5,000,000.

Now, some Members of the House have said to me this morning that they thought the Committee on Appropriations made a mistake in reporting items for additional compensation to certain employees of certain committees of the House of Representatives. In some of these cases the amount was referred by the Committee on Accounts to the Committee on Appropriations. In one or two other cases the Committee on Appropriations acted independently of the Committee on Accounts, and the position taken by the Committee on Appropriations in respect to this extra compensation of employees of committees of the House was this, and I want the Members of the House to understand what prompted a favorable recommendation in this case, as in all other previous Congresses favorable recommendations have been made on items of this kind. The organization of the House consists of a number of committees of the House, and these committees are composed of the membership of the House. We do not recognize the right of any committee to act as a censor upon any other committee.

So far as our committee is concerned, therefore, when the chairman of another committee comes to the Committee on Appropriations with a unanimous recommendation in favor of additional compensation for services rendered to employees of that committee, we do not deem that we are justified in criticizing their action or questioning their judgment as to the value of the services of the men who are employed by them to serve during the session of Congress. For that reason the Committee on Appropriations have recommended additional compensation in the instances mentioned because of the representation of the committees themselves that these employees were entitled to that compensation, and we therefore did not feel justified in turning them down. If there is any criticism that criticism is upon the committee that employed these services and for whose benefit the services were rendered. Personally I do not feel like criticizing or denying them the only opportunity they have for the purpose of giving extra compensation where, in the unanimous judgment of the committee, they were entitled to compensation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one other item in the bill——

Mr. OLMSTED. If the gentleman will pardon me, I would like to ask if there is in this bill any provision for the establishment of a surety-bond bureau.

Mr. TAWNEY. I was coming to that. There is $25,000 recommended in this bill for the creation of a fidelity division in the Treasury Department. Members of this House will recall the fact that about two years ago 17 surety companies formed a combination and increased the premium rates from 50 to 300 per cent. The attention of the members of the Committee on Appropriations was called to that fact by a demand on the disbursing officer to have salaries increased on account of the increased demand for premium on insurance bonds. On the recommendation of the committee, and in a general deficiency bill which passed at the extra session of this Congress, there was a provision that no officer of the Government should be permitted to accept a corporate surety bond where the premium was in excess of that charged during the calendar year of 1908. That provision passed this House with only five dissenting votes, as I recall it. It went to the Senate and was stricken out in the Senate, and in conference the provision was restored, with a limitation that the rate should not exceed 35 per cent of the rate charged in the calendar year of 1908.

Attached to that was the further provision that a commission consisting of three Senators and three Members of the House should be authorized, whose duty was made to investigate the whole question of the surety bonds or fidelity bonds given by officers, agents, and employees to the Government to insure their integrity. That commission consisted of Senator GALLINGER, Senator CURTIS, and Senator FOSTER of Louisiana, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], the gentleman from Mississippi Mr. [BOWERS], and myself on the part of the House. The commission employed two actuaries, one of whom not long ago was the president of the Actuarial Society of the United States, and to assist him the commission employed Mr. Herbert D. Brown. These men have been at work ever since the 1st of July, 1909, gathering statistics under the supervision and direction of the commission as to the loss experienced by the Government covering a period of 15 years. That period was taken because that marks the beginning of the time when corporate surety bonds were authorized to be accepted by officers of the Government.

The result of that investigation, in a nutshell, was that for the protection which the bonded officers of the Government are paying the surety companies the Government is receiving only 36 per cent of that protection. Of the protection which the Government receives from the personal sureties we in fact receive 43 per cent. That is, the personal surety bonds afford more protection to the Government of the United States than do the corporate surety bonds.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not yield. Of the aggregate loss during the 15 years the bonded companies have paid only 36 per cent of the loss. The remaining 64 per cent is evaded, first, by the companies taking advantage of every possible technicality and litigation of all kinds; second, by the failure or insolvency of the companies themselves. Only recently the Government lost from $50,000 to $100,000 by the insolvency of two of these surety companies; third, by the releasing of the surety companies through the action of Congress on bonds to indemnify the Government against loss.

This provision aims to remove all three of these causes. As a result, 64 per cent of the amount of the losses incurred among bonded employees of the Government has been lost. This provision will give the Government of the United States full and complete protection, for every dollar that is lost will be charged against the fidelity fund without litigation, and therefore the Government of the United States will have full and complete protection. The employees of the Government will be able also to furnish the Government that complete protection for at least one-third less than the bonding companies are now charging them, and from which the Government receives only one-third of the protection the bonded officers of the Government are paying for.

Second and third, we provide here that all bonds shall run to the United States. There will be no longer bonded officers whose bonds run to their superiors. The system of bonding subordinates to their superiors arose at a time when the principals were responsible for the appointment of their subordinates. That system has been entirely obliterated.

To-day the Treasurer of the United States, who has several hundred employees under him, has no more to say about who shall be appointed under him as a subordinate than you or I. Yet through the act of that subordinate, a defalcation occurring, the Treasurer would be liable to the Government for it; but the fact that the Treasurer is not guilty of any wrong personally has prompted Congress in the past to relieve him from paying that obligation, and thereby the Government must stand the loss. This provision requires all bonds to run direct to the United States Government, and also requires either a surety bond or a bond without surety, and if they pay the premium fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury under this provision to the credit of the fidelity fund then the Government of the United States has ample protection, has all the protection that the bonded officers of the Government have paid for, and those officers of the Government furnish that protection for two-thirds of what they are now paying the bonding company for it.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. I would like to ask the gentleman for information, whether he knows how much in amount the Government has in noncollectible judgments against surety companies on bonds.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know how much the Government has in noncollectible judgments, but I do know that the Government has received only a little over 43 per cent of the aggregate loss on personal surety bonds.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. The rest of it is in dispute, in litigation, is it?

Mr. TAWNEY. The rest of it is wiped out. If there are any judgments in force I know nothing about them, and the investigation does not disclose the fact. I do know that in one case when the commissioners called upon the bonding company for a statement of their premiums and their losses, included in their contingent liability was an item of $61,000, which only a few days ago they settled with the Treasury Department for $6,000; yet they carried the whole $61,000 as a contingent liability for the purpose of making the best showing that they possibly could.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the committee in relieving the superior officers of liability for the laches or the neglect of their subordinates considered the phase of whether they will not be less liable to scrutinize the action of their subordinates by reason of their being thereby relieved?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; the commission has taken that into consideration, and I will say for the benefit of the gentleman from Wisconsin—I can not stop to read it now, for my time is limited—the commission has written to all of the superior officers in the Government whose subordinates are bonded to them, and also to all of the auditors and the chiefs of divisions who have under them bonded subordinates, to ascertain whether or not the surety companies aid them in detecting any misconduct on the part of their subordinates. In every single instance the answer has been that they have never received any support or aid whatever. On the contrary, it appeared from the testimony of the insurance companies themselves that they have concealed the fact of embezzlements and defalcations from the Government officers in the hope that by leeching or coercing the parents of the defaulting officer to make good the loss they will relieve themselves. They have concealed from the Government of the United States the fact of actual embezzlement of public funds, and if they have not thereby compounded a felony, it ought to be so made by statute.

Mr. STAFFORD. That hardly answers the question I had in mind. My query is directed as to whether this relief of exemption of the superior officer will not incline him to be less rigorous in examining into the accounts or the actions of the subordinates. To-day the postmaster is liable for the embezzlements of the clerk, and the like.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. He is bound thereby to scrutinize the action of the clerk or the other under official. Relieving him from liability may incline him to be careless.

Mr. TAWNEY. We do not relieve him from liability entirely. I know of a case in the post office—and in the Post Office Department all of the subordinates are bonded direct to the Government—where there was a loss of $4,000 in excess of the penalty of the bond of the subordinate. The Government collected the full amount of the bond of the subordinate, and the postmaster was required to make up the balance.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell us the effect of this proposition of the fidelity plan upon the bonds given by such officers as deputy collectors of internal revenue, bonds which now run to the collector?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, these subordinates of the collector would have their bonds run direct to the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Under this plan their bonds would run direct to the United States?

Mr. TAWNEY. All the subordinates instead of paying the surety company would pay a premium fixed upon his bond by the Secretary of the Treasury into the Treasury to the credit of the fidelity fund. Let me say one word more, and that is that this plan is entirely optional with the Government employees. It does not compel them to insure through the fidelity fund. If they can get their surety at a less cost they are at liberty to furnish a surety bond, or a personal bond as well.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then he may still go to an outside voluntary company, and that will be satisfactory to the Government?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is optional in that respect. It is different from the plans of Canada and the Philippine Islands. There it is mandatory, and we make it optional.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER].

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this steam-roller process of passing this bill through the House for two reasons. In the first place, it is absolutely and entirely unnecessary, for there is plenty of time for the House to give it fair and decent consideration, such as it ought to give to a bill which proposes to appropriate nearly $9,000,000 of the people's money. I am opposed to this method for the second reason that this bill carries a provision which constitutes such a sweeping, far-reaching, and drastic change in the established law of the land that it ought never to find a place in any appropriation bill, much less be forced through the House after only 40 minutes of debate, and I refer, Mr. Speaker, to section 3 of the bill, to which the chairman of the committee has just devoted some attention. This legislation had its inception in the special session in 1909, when, as the chairman of the committee says, this House passed an amendment to the urgent deficiency bill which provided that surety companies thereafter should not charge more than 35 per cent in excess of the charges of the year before on fidelity bonds, and the Senate put an additional amendment on the bill creating a joint commission to investigate the entire question of surety bonds. The commission says in its report, which I have seen within the last half hour, that the commission was created because the argument was made, which the commission says was sound, that this important legislation ought not to be put through without a full investigation and an opportunity for discussion in the Congress. Now, the commission has been working for nearly two years behind closed doors, at a very considerable expense, and before it makes any report to this Congress and before a single Member or any other person in the country interested in this matter has had an opportunity to know what the commission has found, it gives a sort of premature birth to the remarkable piece of legislation found in this bill.

Now, after this legislation was passed in 1909 the surety companies maintained a rate in accordance with the maximum rate established by the law for several months, but in September, 1909, my information is that the surety companies began to cut rates again, and rates went down to the prices which prevailed during the cut rates of 1908, so that the effect of the legislation has been to accomplish all that the chairman of the committee claimed for it when he brought it into the House in the deficiency bill of 1909. Despite that fact he now proposes in this bill to embark the Government of the United States——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Can the gentleman from Indiana yield me more time?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. You propose to embark the Government of the United States in the most hazardous business which men could engage in in this country, and I am against the Government going into a business and assuming a liability which this commission itself says amounts to $350,000,000 without an opportunity on the part of the House to understand this question.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. I have only a minute; if I could have four minutes more I would.

Mr. OLMSTED. This bill leaves it optional with the clerks. Suppose a limited number of clerks availed themselves of the option, the fidelity fund would be very small. Now, how would the Government be reimbursed for losses which might occur?

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. They propose to levy this assessment in such a way that it will be cheaper for the employees to get in under this plan than to take the bond of any reputable surety company in the country, and therefore I suppose they will get all the employees into the system.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has again expired.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON].

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, in the short time I have in which to discuss this proposition I do not purpose to deal with the merits of the proposed legislation for bonding Federal employees. I am not concerned with its merits at the present time. But I am opposed to any scheme of legislation which is a radical departure from the settled policy of a century and which seeks to embark the Government into a paternal bonding scheme of any sort for its officers and employees without full opportunity for this House to discuss the merits of the proposition and amend it if necessary.

Only yesterday the report was filed with this House embodying the result of the investigation of the joint commission appointed with regard to this legislation. That report speaks for itself, in that it embraces 100 pages. There have been employed a corps of trained investigators under the charge of two expert actuaries. One year and more of time has been given to the completion of the complicated results of that investigation. Those results have been embodied in a scheme of legislation engrafted upon an appropriation bill, and which scheme seeks to overturn the system of surety liability which the Government has uniformly resorted to in the past. Mr. Speaker, this proposed plan will mean the establishment of the principle of a parental system of government, and is so wide a departure from our settled policy that we ought not to engage in it without careful scrutiny.

I want also to call the attention of this House to the provision of law authorizing the joint commission which has reported the proposed legislation. In the commission's authorization act as embodied in the conference report, and which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has referred to, there is not a suggestion that it should report a plan of legislation changing the method of suretyship liability to the Government by Government employees. The question at issue at that time was purely one of rates.

I know not, nor do I care, for this purpose, whether the bonding companies' rates have in the past been excessive or not. If they were, they should be regulated. If their surety bonds are in a form which under the law did not adequately protect the Government, then the liability clause should have been changed, and they should all perhaps be made to run directly to the United States. If, as a matter of fact, there was any particular in which those bonds were prepared so that the companies were enabled to evade their liability, I say the bonding companies ought to have been made to change them.

But, Mr. Speaker, the subject under discussion in this House to which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has referred was purely one of adjusting the existing rates of the bonding companies and of getting the joint commission's authority to investigate embodied into law. The final form of the statute then passed simply provided that the commission—shall inquire into the rates of premium heretofore and now being charged as well as those proposed to be charged by surety or bonding companies for bonds of officers or employees of the United States and report to Congress by bill or otherwise at its next session what regulation, if any, should be exercised under law or otherwise over the same.

I therefore say, Mr. Speaker, that it is improper to engraft on a deficiency appropriation bill such a comprehensive scheme of legislation as the one before us, and one not contemplated when the commission was created.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] has asked his colleague [Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER] one very pertinent question I want to refer to, namely, if this legislation be optional, and if there is not held out to the Government employee some remarkable inducement or incentive, what assurance have we that there will be created by this optional plan of governmental suretyship a fidelity fund from the low premiums collected from any restricted number of employees who may avail themselves of the proposed law, which will be a sufficient fund to reimburse the Government for a single great loss? It sems to me that that question of itself ought to be sufficient reason to prevent us from passing in a hasty fashion on an appropriation bill legislation of this vital character.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have as much confidence in a bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations, and which they have considered, as I have in a bill reported by any other committee in the House. But I was struck with a statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] a few days ago, when the attempt was made to get a rule to pass the sundry civil bill, that he was not willing to ask the membership of this House to take the judgment of any single committee on a great appropriation bill and the items thereof and that he was not willing to adopt any such precedent. I was very much impressed with that, because he is one of the distinguished members of that committee and did not want to share any such responsibility.

Now, I suppose if there is any appropriation bill that has been before this House that might justify us in passing in this way it is this particular bill. But should we on this side, just starting in to legislate in a few days—according to the papers—adopt a precedent that may come home to vex us? We have plenty of time to consider this bill. Every point of order is waived when the motion to suspend is carried. No opportunity to amend is given, and, according to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], which I heartily approve, hardly ever can a bill be made as good by any one committee as by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Now, inasmuch as we have plenty of time wherein to consider this bill in the usual way, and perhaps can get it passed this afternoon, why not do it? But I want to say, in justice and fairness to the committee and to the House, that it will be ten times—yes, fifty times—more defensible to pass this bill in this way than to pass a bill which practically puts a charge, one-half on the District of Columbia and one-half on the General Treasury of the United States Government, for a gigantic park scheme involving $20,000,000, which I doubt if 20 men or 50 men in the House know anything about, or can sufficiently inform this House upon it in 20 minutes' debate on a motion to suspend the rules. I hope when that motion comes up that gentlemen will think this is a mere bagatelle as compared with suspending the rules and passing a measure involving as many millions as are required for the fortification of the Panama Canal. But I will vote against this motion, because I think it is a bad precedent, because I think it is unnecessary, and because I think we have ample time in which to consider this bill in the proper way, especially when we know what is coming.

Mr. CLAYTON. And we should vote against it because it ought to be beaten, too.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] in many respects, but I disagree with one part of his speech, as to the relative importance of this bill.

I think we ought not to adopt a motion to suspend the rules and pass this bill, because I think a general deficiency bill, above all others, ought to be read in the House, subject to amendment, and ought to be subject to points of order. It is a sort of basket bill. Like the basket clause in a tariff bill, it carries many important items which have not heretofore been appropriated for by Congress, and without intending the slightest reflection on the members of the Committee on Appropriations, I think a motion should not be adopted to suspend the rules and pass such a bill, with no opportunity allowed for amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that it is the custom in a short session of Congress to pass the general deficiency bill under a suspension of the rules?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I was not aware of that fact; but if it is a fact, it is a bad custom. This bill carries $8,000,000. It carries many different items. It carries appropriations for the State Department, the Treasury Department, the District of Columbia, river and harbor work, pensions, the Department of Justice, Department of Agriculture, audited accounts, and many other appropriations. In addition, there have been engrafted upon this bill—and that, I think, is unwise on the part of the Committee on Appropriations—matters not authorized by existing law, which is contrary to the rules of the House, and matters which ought not to go upon an appropriation bill, but should be presented to the House by separate bills.

Now, it is true that the committee puts items subject to points of order in many appropriation bills, but those bills are usually read in the House, and if the items ought not to go in a point of order takes them out of the bill. But if you adopt the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] the effect is that you have not the slightest opportunity to make a point of order against any item in this bill or the slightest opportunity to amend the bill, all rules being suspended.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] have told you that section 3, establishing a fidelity division in the Treasury Department, which practically puts the Government into the bonding business, ought not to be in this bill. Certainly opportunity should be given, if it is subject to a point of order, to those gentlemen and others opposed to that provision to make the point of order. But the effect of the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], if you adopt it, is to pass the bill without any opportunity to make a point of order or any opportunity of amending the bill, and I, for one, am opposed to such procedure.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to detain the House but for a moment. I am unalterably opposed to legislation of this kind. I am opposed to it on principle, because I do not believe it can be justified on any principle whatever.

I recognize the fact that we are here in the closing days of the session of Congress, when everything is in a jam, but I do not believe that the jam can be charged up to this branch of the Congress. If there be a jam anywhere and a fault anywhere, that fault should not be laid at our door. Here is a bill that carries upward of $8,000,000 that must be paid by the people; and while I have the supremest confidence in the great Committee on Appropriations, yet it has been well said, and I have long since learned, that the best legislation is not evolved alone by the committee that has charge of it. I have learned that the best legislation, or at least what I regard as the best legislation, is that which is perfected by going through the Committee of the Whole. Everyone knows that if the motion made by the gentleman from Minnesota is agreed to, all amendments are cut off, all points of order are denied; and while I have had little time to go through this bill, I have no doubt that there are many items in it that ought to go out on points of order. I have no doubt that many of these items should be amended and can be amended.

I know that the threat is constantly held over us "If you men on that side of the House, or those who are opposed to this motion, want to take the chance of a special session, vote down this rule."

Mr. Speaker, I am not desirous of bringing on a special session, but to me it has few terrors when it comes to doing what I regard as my plain duty, in opposing this motion, taking the chances of reading this bill under the five-minute rule, and letting it come up in its natural, orderly, and decent way. [Applause.]

Nor does the argument that it has been customary heretofore to pass general deficiency bills under a suspension of the rules appeal to me; because, if it has ever been the policy of Congress to pass any appropriation bill under a suspension of the rules, that policy, in my judgment, can not be defended. It is erroneous, and it is the last time that we should adopt it.

Mr. CLAYTON. The bill is only 85 pages long.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The bill is only 85 pages long, as suggested by the gentleman from Alabama. Last week we were assured by the able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that if we did not adopt the motion passing the sundry civil bill under suspension of the rules, it would surely bring on an extra session.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. If we had gone on under the rules of the House to-day we would have been almost through with this bill.

Mr. COX of Indiana. That is true. If we had begun the reading of this bill under the five-minute rule we would have been almost through with it. Last week we considered the sundry civil bill, carrying $140,000,000, and nearly 240 pages long, and passed it through the House in less than two days. I do not entertain any question but what if we remain here we can pass this bill before 12 o'clock to-night, and I hope this motion will be voted down. I will never vote for any rule shutting off points of order or amendments to bills of any kind, when the only argument advanced for the rule is time. The people are entitled to the very best legislation we can give them, and all know that if this amendment be adopted it can not be given due and careful consideration, because the adoption of the rule passes the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass this bill with the amendments.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that he was in doubt.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 157, answered "present" 6, not voting 86, as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 31856) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia. The statement has already been read this morning and I ask unanimous consent that its reading be dispensed with as well as that of the report.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the reading of the report and the statement will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, there is a full and complete agreement between the conferees of the two Houses. The action of the House yesterday in defeating the Senate amendment increasing the salaries of the commissioners was conformed to by the conferees. That is the only change in the bill from what it was as presented yesterday. I move the adoption of the report.

The motion was agreed to.

AUTOMOBILES ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. WANGER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported the bill (H. R. 32570; H. Rept. No. 2270) providing for the regulation, identification, and registration of automobiles engaged in interstate commerce and the licensing of the operators thereof, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority may have until to-morrow to file a report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Curtis, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5037. An act for the relief of G. A. Embry; and

S. 10808. An act to authorize the Greeley-Arizona Irrigation Co. to build a dam across the Colorado River at or near Head Gate Rock, near Parker, in Yuma County, Ariz.

ORGANIZED MILITIA.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up now the privileged report (No. 2275, with H. Res. 1001) from the Committee on Rules which was under consideration at the time that I yielded to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to move to suspend the rules and pass the general deficiency bill. The rule has already been read from the desk and I ask unanimous consent that, for the information of the House, it be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the rule.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Was it not the agreement that the deficiency bill should be gotten out of the way, passed or defeated, before this would come up?

The SPEAKER. There is no agreement about it, so far as the Chair is informed or believes.

Mr. MANN. The motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to suspend the rules was defeated.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged matter and the deficiency bill is a privileged matter—and many bills are privileged, for that matter——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to refresh the memory of the Chair. Did not the Chair make the agreement with the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DALZELL. That was, that the gentleman from Minnesota should make his motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill. He has already done that, but the motion was defeated.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What has become of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It has gone to the Union Calendar.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to discuss the rule I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri how much time he wants.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Individually, I do not want any. If the gentleman will take 20 minutes off the time granted for the debating of this rule and add it to the general debate under the rule and give me half of the time, I will waive this debate about the rule, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] who wanted to debate it is not here.

Mr. DALZELL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will be willing to add 30 minutes to the general debate on the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; and give me half of this. That would be 45 minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I will agree to that, if the House does. I ask unanimous consent that that agreement may be made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAY) there were—ayes 122, noes 83.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 28436 has already been read in the House, and I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. Under the order previously made by unanimous consent, there will be one hour and a half general debate, 45 minutes to be within the control of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and 45 minutes within the control of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the author of the bill [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill may be divided into two classes, the first relating to the pay of the National Guard, and as I have already explained those provisions to the House on the motion to suspend the rules, it is not necessary to go over that again. The other features of the bill may be called the administrative features, and seek to correct some defects in the existing law. We should bear in mind that originally under the acts regarding the militia of 1792 and 1795 the militia could be called out by the President in time of war directly without any intervention of the governor of a State, and at the time of the Civil War that power was exercised in many instances and enforced. Now, when the law of 1903, known as the Dick law, was passed, there appeared for the first time a provision that the call should be made through the governor, and that was retained when that law was amended in 1908.

Originally the law provided that the militia should consist of all able-bodied men between the ages of 18 and 45, and all were required to render military services, to be enrolled, and to provide themselves with certain equipment. The Dick law retained a part of the provisions, but classified the militia into the reserve militia and the Organized Militia or National Guard. Now, the War Department has found fault with the existing law in this, that there is no provision for reaching the militia in case of war and compelling them to respond to a call. There is no jurisdiction in any court-martial to try a militiaman or a national guardsman for refusing to respond, and we have corrected that upon the suggestion and recommendation of the War Department. It simply restores the law and the working system substantially as it was originally, so that you will readily see that the fears of some gentlemen who debated this measure a few days ago upon the motion to suspend the rules are unfounded.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. In a minute. It does not interfere with the independence of the States or infringe upon the proper limits of the doctrine of autonomy of the States or State rights.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the provisions in the bill under which a militiaman is subject to court-martial if he does not respond to the call of the President is in line with the old militia law, and that it simply restores the conditions that were under the old law?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is certain about that?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes. Now, the other provisions of the law relate simply to the inspection of the troops. The War Department explained in the hearings, through Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, Chief of Staff, the necessity for this provision, inasmuch as under the law as it is now they were unable to determine beforehand what part of the National Guard was fit for military duty and was efficient; whether they were physically suitable, and the law, therefore, as we propose to make it, covers that point and makes them subject to examination and approval by the War Department before they can draw any of this pay herein provided for. These provisions were suggested by the War Department as a condition precedent to the pay of the militia as contemplated by the bill, and the Committee on Militia agreed that that was a proper condition and that these defects in the law should be corrected. Now, in regard to the substantive proposition in the bill, to pay the militia or National Guard for this training, as contemplated by the bill, I wish to remind the Members of the House of the fact that under the law as it is and as it has always been and even under the State constitutions of most of the States, every able-bodied man is liable to military duty in time of war, and impliedly, therefore, everyone should be ready to perform that duty. Now, we are an industrial Nation. The vast population here is engaged in the pursuits of industry and commerce, and although we have estimated approximately 16,000,000 men in the United States of military age, yet none of them, or at least very few, prepare themselves to discharge this duty to their country in case of war, but in each State they have an Organized Militia or National Guard, a voluntary force, that is almost entirely serving without compensation, and this measure seeks to compensate them to a small degree for the extra work involved in acquiring the necessary knowledge and training to fit them for duty in case of war.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not want to break in on the gentleman's argument, but I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that this provision on page 2—

That no officer shall be entitled to compensation until he shall have passed such examination as shall be prescribed for officers of that grade by the Secretary of War—is somewhat conflicting.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not think it conflicts with the Constitution.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is sure of that?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, it is my opinion.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. For a question, if it is brief.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota who creates the national military board referred to in this act. How is it constituted?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is created under a former law.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Now, I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I have searched the statutes carefully and I can not find where it is in any of the acts.

Mr. STEENERSON. I can not help that. It is there. Now, I desire to say further——

Mr. HOWLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. In a moment. I desire to say, further, that the United States, with the exception of Great Britain, is the only important country in the world that has no compulsory military service. We depend for our defense entirely upon volunteers. The Regular Army is recruited from volunteers and so is the National Guard, and that relieves these fifteen or sixteen million men subject to military duty from any preparation.

When these young men throughout the different States who belong to the National Guard are required, as they are under the existing law, to prepare themselves with great labor, it is but fair that the rest of us who do not so prepare or abandon our business should contribute something to aid them in making good at least their loss of money spent in this preparation.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOWLAND].

Mr. HOWLAND. I would like to have the gentleman give me the constitutional authority which justifies the Federal Government in appropriating money out of the Federal Treasury to pay the officers of the guard and the men of the guard when they are not in the employ of the Federal Government.

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, the Constitution provides that Congress shall provide for the training of the militia, and this is a provision for that purpose, and I do not think there is any question about it. As I have said, these men, out of 16,000,000 of military age in the United States, are doing this work for our security. And it is but fair that a small allowance should be given to them by the United States. The States contribute something, and in some States I am told those of military age are required to contribute in order that the State may disburse that money to the National Guard in their States. It seems to me it is a perfectly fair and equitable provision.

From the foundation of this Government it was a great problem how to establish a well-regulated militia, and it was conceded up to 1903 that we had failed. Since that legislation the militia has concededly improved, and has now achieved, comparatively speaking, great efficiency. We have accomplished what George Washington so eloquently said was a great work. In one of his messages to Congress he said:

The devising of well-regulated militia would be a genuine source of legislative honor and a perfect title to public gratitude.

We think with this legislation and the previous legislation that I have alluded to, that we will have devised a well-regulated militia system that will prove satisfactory and, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, will give us such preparation as is reasonably necessary for war, and it seems to me we should not look upon this entirely from the standpoint of the Appropriations Committee.

We are responsible for the safety of this great Nation of ninety millions of people. We are responsible for the permanence of its institutions, for its wealth, and for its civilization. History tells us that the richer the nation, the more advanced in civilization, the greater the temptation there is for a foreign foe to seek to invade our limits. And we can not wave it aside by saying it will cost a few million dollars.

We are spending, it is true, $100,000,000 a year upon the Regular Army. We are spending $4,000,000 dollars for equipment for the militia. If we spend the maximum, estimated under this bill as $8,000,000, it will be only $12,000,000 for 120,000 officers and men, or at the rate of $100 apiece for that vast army.

It seems to me that it is the most economical measure that can be proposed. We certainly would not expect that we had done our duty in preparing for the national defense if we did not do something to continue the excellent condition of the militia and continue to improve it, and put the law in such a state as to make it a workable system.

Granted that the Army and Navy and militia costs a large amount annually to maintain, the fact remains that their maintenance is necessary for the security and defense of our country. The service of all these men, in all branches, is voluntary. We must either pay a reasonable compensation or we can not fill the ranks unless we resort to conscription or involuntary servitude. Is there anyone here who advocates that?

We often hear it said that ours is the most expensive military service in the world, and that ours is the most costly army, and so forth. That is true, and the reason is that this is the highest wage country in the world.

When we hire men for this service we must pay something like what could be earned in civil life or the ranks will not be filled.

Upon reflection, therefore, it seems to me that it will appear to any fair-minded person that the large sums spent for the public defense is not due to extravagance on the part of Congress, nor to undue pressure exerted by militarists among us, but to the fact that this is not only a free but a high-priced country, where even the common soldier is entitled to fair pay and a decent standard of living. You can not abandon the country to a defenseless condition, and you can not maintain a proper defense except by paying what it costs.

This legislation was recommended in the annual report of the Secretary of War, and by the Chief of Staff and all the officials of the War Department.

I do not claim to be a military authority, but I lay this before you in the light of common sense and fairness, that it is a measure not for the purpose of giving money for something simply for show, but to compensate these men for actual work. The time of the tin soldier and of display is gone by, so far as the militia is concerned. Everyone familiar with the National Guard work for the last few years knows that it is efficient, and everyone knows that the guardsmen undergo actual training and work and study, and that therefore they are entitled to some recognition for this work for our common benefit. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time has the gentleman consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to impose a permanent charge upon the revenues of the Government of about $6,000,000 annually. Members on this side of the House should realize that within a very short time Congress will be convened for the purpose of revising the revenue laws of the United States in order to reduce the burdens of taxation and to afford some relief to the people from the present onerous burdens from which they suffer. It will be impossible to bring any relief whatever to the country if we are continually to add to the permanent charges for which provision must be made by revenue legislation.

Two things will be demanded of the Democratic Party in the next House—one, to reduce substantially the appropriations of the public money for the conduct of the public service, and the other to reduce substantially the taxes imposed under the tariff laws.

The appropriations for the past two or three years have exceeded one thousand millions of dollars annually; unless substantial reductions are made in the appropriations it will be impossible for any committee of this House, however gifted or however earnest, to give any relief from the present extortionate tariff taxes.

It is said that the real purpose of this bill is to perfect the militia of the country, to afford some method by which we may be able to avoid augmenting our permanent military force and to organize the militia upon such a basis that it will be possible to resort to it in the time of difficulty. The truth of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that this country has been able to rely upon its volunteers and its militia since the foundation of the Government without any financial aid from the Federal Government until within a very few years. In order to harmonize the militia equipment and to standardize its equipment, Congress has enacted laws by which there is annually appropriated $4,000,000 for the militia, and now it is proposed to add to this expenditure $6,000,000 or $8,000,000 annually in addition.

An examination of this bill discloses that it will not accomplish its purposes. It may be of some benefit to the men who have commissions in the National Guard of the various States, because it gives them, during the entire year, a certain percentage of the compensation paid to officers in the Regular Army holding similar rank. But to the enlisted man it will be neither an inducement nor an advantage. It provides that he may receive 25 per cent of the pay of an enlisted man in the Army, provided he satisfactorily performs at least 48 drills in a year. Men in the various States cheerfully enlist in the National Guard and willingly pay dues and subject themselves to fines and punishment for failure to comply with the regulations. Under this bill the opportunity to obtain $45 in one year by compliance with the regulations of the War Department will not be any inducement to others to enter the militia or to have the men perform the duties imposed upon the militia by the Federal Government, but it will do something, Mr. Speaker, that will plague us in the future more than can be foretold at present. It will be the beginning of a movement by which men in the National Guard in all parts of the country will be awakened to take an interest in the amount of money appropriated by the Federal Government for the aid of the militia.

When men are put upon a basis where they receive 25 per cent of the pay of an enlisted man they will very quickly demand that the compensation be increased to 50, to 75, and then to 100 per cent of the pay of an enlisted man; and then, with this organized movement extending into every little hamlet throughout the country, will come an irresistible demand that the pay of the enlisted men of the Army be increased so that the militia may be the beneficiaries, and instead of imposing an annual charge of six or eight million dollars, as some well-informed persons predict, it will very easily result in a fixed charge of over $30,000,000 a year.

I have heard it said by men who are well informed that the best that can be expected at the first attempt to revise our Army estimates will be to save $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 a year from the present appropriations. If this bill becomes a law every dollar to be saved from the present Army budget must be appropriated to carry out the provisions of this act.

We expend now $125,000,000 a year for the Navy, about $100,000,000 for the Army, $4,000,000 under the Dick law for the militia, and now it is proposed to add from $6,000,000 to $8,000,000 more to our expenditures for military purposes.

I will not go into the question as to the necessity or advisability of legislation to improve the militia. It is my contention that in the dying hours of this Congress it is a gross injustice to attempt to enact a bill which is bound to increase the fixed charges of the Government by from $6,000,000 to $8,000,000. Heretofore we have relied upon the patriotism of the men of the United States to interest them in the National Guard and in the militia, and to equip themselves properly for service in time of need, but now it is proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] that we change our policy, and instead of relying upon patriotic motives, that we rely upon selfishness and greed, and entirely upon a financial inducement for men to undertake service in the militia.

The day after this bill was before the House, Friday last, I read in a paper published in my home city of four officers of one of the most prominent regiments in the National Guard having tendered their resignations because of the onerous duties imposed under the revised regulations of the War Department. The statement was made that not only had four resignations been submitted, but that an additional number were soon to be expected.

Those gentlemen who imagine that men engaged in the ordinary occupations of life can in some manner, by some small pittance, be induced to devote an unreasonable amount of time to military service or to the equipment of themselves for military duty will find out that they are very sadly mistaken.

A long step forward was taken when the Dick law was enacted. It provided means by which standardized equipment could be distributed among the National Guard in the various States, and it also provided means by which such men could be compensated when engaging in joint maneuvers with the Regular Army of the United States.

This bill proposes, however, that these men, when they assemble at their armories during the year, to engage in the regular drills which are provided weekly in all parts of the country, shall have as an inducement the fact that if they attend these drills, and attend 75 per cent of the prescribed number of 48, they may be compensated at the rate of not quite $1 for each drill which they attend.

Mr. Speaker, it is preposterous to assert that such compensation will be any inducement to a man who heretofore has been willing to pay for the privilege of engaging in such drills, and who has entered upon an obligation by which he can be subjected to a financial penalty in case he fails to live up to his obligation.

The real effect of this bill will be, first, to advance very materially the interest of the officers of the guard, and secondly, to promote a lobby extending throughout the United States to coerce Congress into greatly increased expenditures for war purposes. I hope this bill will not receive the approval of the House at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, this bill, in my judgment, is against the interests of the National Guard of the United States, notwithstanding I have received telegrams and letters from various members of that organization in my State asking me to vote for it. This bill, in my opinion, controverts the spirit of the Federal Constitution. Congress under the Constitution has certain powers over the militia organizations of the different States. In Article I of the Constitution we find this provision:

> Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion.

Further—

> to provide for organizing the Army and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

This bill is a departure from that fundamental principle in our Government as embodied in the Constitution, because, as I will be able to show you, the control of these organizations under the provisions of this bill is absolutely transferred from the several States to the War Department here in Washington.

The bill as originally presented by the National Guard had only one purpose, and that was to provide for pay by the Federal Government to the Organized Militia and the officers thereof in order to relieve them in part from the burdens and expenses incident thereto.

But that bill was submitted to the War Department and the War Department added the proviso in section 5, which completely changes the primary object of the bill proposed by the National Guard organization, and transforms the whole tenor and purpose thereof and makes it a bill in the interest of the War Department of the United States, rather than in the interest of the Organized Militia.

It ignores rules heretofore observed in regard to the rights of the States, and provides that even the pay received by the men shall be paid at the office of the War Department.

Now, I want to call your attention to what Gen. Wood, of the United States Army, said about this bill in the hearings and you will see the reasons which influence the War Department in desiring this legislation. We are expending over $100,000,000 annually in maintaining the Regular Army of the United States. We have 82,000 men in the Regular Army, but we have only about 20,000 in the United States proper. I will read from the hearings before the committee the statement of Gen. Wood:

> Mr. ASHBROOK. Is that two years from the time of their enlistment or two years from the time of being called into the service of the United States?
> Gen. WOOD. Two years from the time of call. You see, our situation to-day is just this: We have an army of about 82,000 men, of which nearly 18,000 are in the Philippines, a regiment in Alaska, and we have to put about six in Hawaii, and four or five on the Panama Canal, and it is going to bring us down in the United States to less than 20,000 mobile troops. Under the Dick law we are required to accept the whole militia, and these amendments are put in such shape that we shall know we can get it all, get it well instructed, and have it long enough so that it will be of some service, and in case we have to replace it by volunteers there will be time to do it. Of course, the chances are that as soon as the militia is called, if we had a great war, we would have to call for a certain number of volunteers in addition. We hope to have the militia in such condition that we can accept it all, on a peace basis of perhaps 120,000 men, in round numbers; on a war footing it would be about 200,000 men, so it is evident that to bring this force up to a war footing it will be necessary to add a very large number of new men. This makes it all the more important that we should be able to hold all the old ones, hence the proviso that these men who have received Federal pay shall serve for not to exceed two years if the Government requires their services. And then, again, if these men had been receiving Federal pay for a number of years, it is not right that they should go out of the service immediately; it seems but fair that they should be liable for at least two years' service if needed.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose a militiaman has served almost two years in the militia, perhaps has a month more to serve, and then is called upon to serve the United States, he would have to serve two years more?

Gen. WOOD. Yes; if he had received Federal pay, and if the Government required him for that length of time.

Now, in that connection, I want to call your attention again to the particular provision in the bill which I regard as the most unjust and monstrous provision ever inserted in a law relating to the military service of the United States. If a proposition was introduced into this House to require and compel all able-bodied men to serve for a definite period in the United States Army, how many of you would dare to vote for it? And yet we have men in the War Department that have recently advocated such a law; but it is contrary to the spirit of American institutions to compel military service except in a great exigency, such as actual war. And yet you propose to require these militia boys, scattered all over the country, in every State of this Union, before they can receive pay under this bill, to take the oath of allegiance and make an agreement to perform military service for two years in case of war independent of their enlistment, which requirement is not imposed on enlisted men in the Regular Army. Listen to this provision. I want to read it again:

Provided, That no money appropriated under the provisions of this act shall be paid to any person who is not suited to the military service according to the standards prescribed by the Secretary of War, nor shall any such money be paid to any person who has not taken the oath of allegiance to the United States, including an agreement to render military service to the United States during any period for which he may be called into such service, providing such period shall not exceed two years.

What is its purport? It is this monstrous propositon, namely, that while the men who enlist in the Regular Army under the rules and regulations of the War Department which have obtained since the establishment of this Government may retire from service at the end of their enlistment, yet if a young man enlists in the militia of his State and under this bill receives one-fourth pay from the Federal Government, he must take an oath and sign an agreement that in case of war he will serve two years, independent of his enlistment—a draft in advance, based upon his honor. Who is willing to stand for it? Yet there it is, and the meaning of it has been clearly explained by Gen. Wood of the Army.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That is in the amendment proposed?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That is in the amendment in section 5, but that is not all of section 5. The other day my time was so limited that I did not state my objections to certain other provisions in section 5. I want to call attention to them now. It reads further:

And any officer or enlisted man of the militia who, having received pay under the provisions of this act, neglects or refuses, under any pretext whatsoever, to present himself for muster when called into the service of the United States, shall be subject to trial by any court-martial constituted as now provided by law.

That is the requirement imposed by the terms of this bill upon each member of the Organized Militia who shall receive Federal pay. He can not excuse himself under any pretext whatever without being rendered liable to court-martial and trial for violation of the law as a deserter.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I have not the time to yield. Such is the duty imposed upon each enlisted man. They call upon him for his service. He has no discretion. If he refuses under any pretext whatsoever he is to be court-martialed and tried as a deserter and punished as prescribed by law for desertion. What is the converse of that proposition? If they desire his services they compel him to serve, but if, on the other hand, they do not desire his service, what is the result? Listen to the further reading of this proposed amendment:

And provided further, That nothing in this act, or in any other act, shall be construed to require the United States, in time of war, to accept the services of any militia organization or of any person belonging to such organization unless such organization or person has been regularly inspected, reported fit for military service according to the standard prescribed by the Secretary of War, and so carried upon the rolls of the Adjutant General of the Army.

In other words, if you pass this bill you no longer have a State militia in the different States of the Union, but under the designation of a National Guard or militia organization you have an adjunct to the Regular Army of the United States in the several States of the Union. Does the Organized Militia of this country desire any such law? Why, the Constitution says it shall be the duty of the States to drill the men and to appoint the officers of the Organized Militia, and what does this bill provide? The Secretary of War is not obligated under the provisions of this act or any other law to accept any organization or any man in any organization unless they come up to the standard prescribed by the Secretary of War and their names are so carried upon the rolls of the Adjutant General of the Army.

It is a dangerous bill. It is a dangerous bill to the thousands of young men all over this country who, actuated by patriotic impulses, have joined the National Guard expecting, in the event of war, to be associated with their friends and companions, and to be called into the service of the United States in the performance of patriotic duty. In the Secretary of War is lodged the power to dismember their companies, to take the officers and men he thinks proper and to reject the others. You have no National Guard if this becomes a law. The men named and designated as members of the National Guard have become a great and powerful adjunct of the Army of the United States, and, as I said in the outset, that is contrary to the spirit, if not to the letter, of the Federal Constitution. It is contrary to the traditions of the people of the United States for more than 100 years. I resent the effort to pass this bill as dangerous to the liberties of the people and declare that its enactment is against the interest of every national guardsman in the country, notwithstanding the provision for Federal pay. Oh, but they say, if the militiaman receives one-quarter pay he ought to serve two years independent of his enlistment. Yet the Regular soldier, the enlisted man in the United States Army, is not required under any law, except those laws providing that soldiers may be drafted in time of actual war, to perform military service beyond the period of his enlistment. In behalf of the gallant boys who belong to the National Guard in 46 States, I protest against the passage of this bill. They have asked for bread and you propose, at the behest of the War Department, to give them a stone. They asked for a small pittance of Federal pay, and in consideration thereof you propose to impose upon them all the exacting regulations and requirements of the Regular Army, and to enforce a two years' service in case of actual war, independent of their enlistment, by a trial by court-martial, and in case of conviction, by the pains and penalties provided by law for desertion. I regard this bill as the most dangerous, the most far-reaching and momentous measure that has been proposed in this body since I have been a Member of Congress.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 25 minutes remaining and two minutes left from the time he yielded to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with my friend from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] that this country has confidently relied upon its militia for over 100 years for its defense. I go further and say that it ought to rely for all time for its principal defense on its militia. I do not believe that the people of the United States ought ever to become reconciled to the necessity of a large standing army, and I believe that the passage of this bill will go a long way, or at least be a step in the right direction, to prevent that very thing.

Theoretically all able-bodied men are members of the militia, and upon these the Government has a right to rely for its defense. So long as the weapons used by soldiers were of a simple character and they were opposed by similar weapons in the hands of the enemy there was no great need for long or continuous training. It was sufficient when the danger arose for volunteers to be called for, and volunteers have always been forthcoming. Patriotism has always existed in this country, and I believe always will, and that alone might have sufficed so long as simple weapons were used; but one of the greatest developments of this age has been in connection with firearms and ordnance of various kinds.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Gladly.

Mr. SULZER. This bill, as I understand it, provides that the Federal Government shall pay the militiamen of the States. Does the gentleman think that that is a good innovation?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, well, it is not an innovation. The members of the militia have received for many years pay from the Federal Government every time they were called out for maneuvers in connection with the Federal troops. They have always been paid by the Government, and paid directly by the paymaster of the United States Government, so it is not an innovation at all. This bill carries it a little further, and instead of paying for the drills during maneuvers only, it is now proposed to pay them for the drills during the year; in other words, in their preparation for the maneuvers.

Mr. SULZER. Does not the gentleman think it would be sufficient for the Federal Government to furnish the militia of the States with arms, clothes, and munitions of war and for the States to pay their own militia?

Mr. TILSON. If I thought so I should not favor this bill, but it has been my observation and experience as a member of the National Guard for a number of years that we can not depend upon the States alone, and that the States are not uniform in the treatment of their militia. In the gentleman's State of New York I admit that the State has been most liberal, but in other States it has not been so. It is especially not so with the National Guard of some of our Southern States, as appears from a number of letters received by me from guardsmen in that part of the country. Even my own State, though more liberal with its militia than many of the States, has not been liberal enough to enable the members of its National Guard to be thoroughly trained and instructed without considerable financial loss and hardship to themselves.

Mr. SULZER. How much will it cost the Federal Government to carry out the provisions of this act, if it becomes a law?

Mr. TILSON. I understand that the provisions of this law, if applied to the National Guard as it stands to-day, if the ranks were full and all these men had measured up to the standard, would approximate $8,000,000, but taking the ranks depleted in many organizations, as I know to be the case, and assuming that all can not measure up to the high standard of efficiency required by this bill, it is estimated, as nearly as can be gotten at by the reports of the various inspectors sent out by the United States Army into the various States, that a little more than $4,000,000 would be at first required. I for one should hope that at an early day all the organizations of the various States might measure up to the proper standard of efficiency and require the $8,000,000 instead of the $4,000,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. I should like to have about three minutes more.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, just a word in regard to the necessities for this bill.

For more than a dozen years I have been a member of the National Guard. For part of that time I was a captain, and we all know it is an axiom of the Army that "like captain like company;" that the captain is the most important officer of the Army. I know some of the difficulties of a captain in trying to fill the ranks of his company, and I know that those difficulties have been growing from year to year in filling up the organization with proper men.

It is all very well to say that patriotic young men will join these organizations and devote their time to them. They have done so in the past to some extent, but the requirements were not then so great or so exacting. The requirements are growing more and more difficult every year, and we can not find fault with that, because if we are going to have a guard at all we want it so that it will be of some account when the time comes to use it. We can not find fault with the requirements, but the fact remains that they have been growing harder and harder every year, so that whereas companies were easily maintained at a maximum some years ago, it is now increasingly difficult to do so. The officers now have to use additional evenings for study, and the enlisted men, especially the noncommissioned officers, have to give more study to their duties. So that it is more difficult from year to year to fill the ranks of organizations.

It seems to me that if we are to have anything like an efficient force for the national defense it has come down to a choice between enlarging the Regular Army, and making this a valuable adjunct, to use the words of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], to the Regular Army in the way of a well-trained and partially paid National Guard.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield before he does that?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it the experience of the gentleman in his own State that it is more difficult to obtain recruits than formerly?

Mr. TILSON. It is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I want to say to the gentleman that that is the condition in the State of Pennsylvania, and that this is in compliance with the request of military men to have something of this kind done in order to have the ranks filled.

Mr. TILSON. I am told that the adjutants general of all the States have been urging this from time to time, and they certainly know the needs in their respective States.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will permit, I wish to say that I, also, have been a captain in the militia until I was elected to Congress, and every year it became more and more difficult, as the requirements increased, to get recruits in my neighborhood.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I really regret that I am unable to see my way clear to support this bill. My attention was first directed to it by requests coming from my home State that I should support it. Upon scrutinizing the bill and analyzing its terms and provisions as best I could, I was irresistibly driven to the conclusion that, taking its accomplishments and its involvements together, it is one of the most dangerous bills which has been presented to this body for action during this or for several past sessions.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the second step in the movement to absolutely destroy the militia of the States as a State organization and make it a component part of the standing Army of the United States. And, as certain as the sun shines, if this bill shall pass, it will in the years to come be followed by legislation that will accomplish the result of destroying the militia as a State militia and making it all a part and parcel of the regular standing Army of the United States.

Now, I do not think that is a desirable situation. The State militia is not only to be used as a National Guard in times of national stress and storm, but the State militia is also to be used to preserve peace and order and to prevent violence within the States. And yet, sirs, if this bill is passed and is followed to its logical conclusion, as it will be, the time will come, and come soon, when the State militia will not be subject to the orders of the State authorities, but will be absolutely under the orders and subject to the control of the authorities of the United States, and your State militia will be gone.

The gentleman from New York and other gentlemen have dwelt upon the economical phase of the matter, and that is a phase that is worthy of great consideration, particularly since this addition of $6,000,000 to the fixed expenses of the Government is proposed at a time when a deficit is staring the Congress in the face, notwithstanding the fact that through all the years of the past we have moved so admirably and so well under the system of a State militia supported alone by the States. Oh, this is but another movement brought about by that desire to shift expense from the States to the Federal Government, another development brought about by this system of indirect taxation. The man in the State knows when he pays his State taxes, because he pays the cash and gets only a tax receipt in return. But the citizen does not realize when he pays his Federal taxes, because the hand of the taxgatherer is hidden, and the result is that there is constantly growing up in all parts of the country the idea that expenses that have heretofore been borne by the States can properly be shifted upon the Federal Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] yield some of his time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. This bill should pass. It is a reasonable and sensible solution of the problem which for years has perplexed those who are in favor of economy in the administration of public affairs and are at the same time anxious to see the efficiency of our Military Establishment increased.

The suggestion that the measure is unconstitutional is disposed of by the language of the Constitution, which provides that Congress "shall have power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia."

The claim that it destroys the State militia as such is wholly unsupported by any line in the bill. Its relation to and duty toward the respective States is not modified in any manner whatsoever.

The complaint that it subjects members of the guard to military duty in an emergency is without merit, because it would be utterly absurd to expend money for the training of these young men and then, when they have become efficient and the Nation needs them, have no right to command their services.

Besides, joining the militia is not compulsory, and in the first instance is entirely voluntary.

As a matter of economy its merits are manifest. We now expend nearly $100,000,000 annually to sustain our present Army of 82,000 men.

By this measure we add to the Nation's reserve force of trained soldiers between 120,000 and 150,000 men by the expenditure of the remarkably small sum of from $4,000,000 to $6,000,000.

By degrees we are wiping out the old prejudice existing between the National Guard and the Regular Army. The harmonizing of the military methods of the two bodies and the uniting of the two in closer relations will do more than all else to avert the increase of the regular standing army at an enormous cost.

By the previous training these young men will receive in times of peace they will prevent that useless and cruel slaughter which has marked the opening of all our military struggles, because of the lack of training of the thousands of brave young raw recruits who have so willingly responded in time of need to their country's call.

With four dying of disease in hospitals for every one in battle, the last war furnished its own sad commentary on former methods.

Add to this useless sacrifice of life the vast sums we necessarily pay in pensions because of the deaths and disease contracted as a consequence of lack of thorough training and another powerful argument is furnished for the passage of this bill from the standpoint of economy alone.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I have but five minutes, but I will yield.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Why not put a similar provision into the law relative to the enlisted men in the Regular Army?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Such a provision is not necessary in the case of the enlisted men, because they now enlist for a period of years, and they are subject during that period of years to any military duty that the emergencies of the United States may render necessary.

Now, the duties of these young men in the militia are rather onerous. They are not getting this money for nothing.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Certainly, I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. The gentleman stated a few moments ago that the National Guard of Pennsylvania are unanimous for this bill.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I said the sentiment was overwhelmingly for it among the national guardsmen of Pennsylvania.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. I want to ask the gentleman if he has heard of any sentiment in Pennsylvania in favor of this bill outside of the National Guard?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I have always heard of a sentiment in the State of Pennsylvania, especially among the sensible people who compose its citizenship, in favor of any measure that will produce wise and economical results in the management of the civil and military establishments of the United States Government.

As to whether the men in the guard are entitled to pay, I might add that the character of their duties is far more onerous than is ordinarily believed.

In a brief conversation with my distinguished friends Col. Thomas J. Stewart, adjutant general of Pennsylvania, and Col. Albert J. Logan, of our National Guard, at Pittsburg, I was more than ever impressed with the necessity for this legislation, because the detailed explanations were in accord with the statements I had heard from the men in the ranks many times before.

The duties required of officers and enlisted men of the National Guard of the several States since the passage of the Dick bill, with its amendments, closely associating the National Guard with the Army, are very different from that generally understood by many citizens. While the work assigned to both officers and men in every grade requires a great deal of time, study, and attention, the duties that devolve upon the captain of a company and his responsibilities are the greatest. To be a successful company commander in the National Guard requires many qualities; in fact, more than in the regular establishment. First, he must have good health and energy and enthusiasm in his work. In the Army the recruits are secured and sent to the company commander. In the National Guard the company commander is charged with getting the recruits, or members of his company, all of whom have to be passed on by the regimental surgeon as to physical fitness for the service in accordance with the standard set by the War Department. The recruit having passed a satisfactory physical examination, the captain is responsible for his development into a useful fighting machine that will be of service to the United States in case of war.

In a company of Infantry there must be, in time of peace, at least 58 enlisted men. Now, a soldier being physically satisfactory must be taught many things—such as soldierly bearing, promptness, respect to superior authority, obedience to all orders and instructions, the proper care of his person and the property in his charge, how to care for his health under circumstances of limited opportunity, what he should eat and drink and the care of his body, so that fatigue and disease may have the least effect on him. He must be taught how to march and carry a rifle and to maneuver in the squad and company, so that as a unit of either he can do his part in the close-order drill, the close-order drill being that which the public usually sees on the drill floor or in a street parade, and the smallest part of the work of a successful soldier. Guard duty has to be taught. The duties of a sentinel are of the utmost importance to the military organization of any army. For a soldier to know how to best protect the persons and property he is charged with can not be underrated.

The recruit must be taught the proper use of the modern rifle, how to care for it and how to fire accurately with it, how to gauge distance and the proper adjustment of the sight and windage, all of which are so highly important with the present modern rifle. This has to be taught both on the indoor and field ranges.

Then comes the field work, which requires knowledge of maps, contours, judging distance, training in observation, and being able to accurately report that which has been seen.

In addition to the above there is the care of the company property, such as clothing and equipment, that is necessary and required to be on hand by the Government. All this goes to make up the administration of a company of the National Guard and is particularly charged to the company commander, who is required to give bond for the safe-keeping and return of the Government and State property. This is no small task when a company commander must at all times have a full equipment for at least 58 men and may have nearly double this number. This equipment includes the service and dress uniforms, flannel shirt, overcoat, blanket, poncho, hat, cap, shelter tent, haversack, canteen, mess kit, cartridge belt and attachments for each man, and in addition a field kitchen outfit, stove, mess kettles and pans, field desk, intrenching tools, and so forth, in value worth several thousand dollars, and all to be kept in serviceable condition and ready for use at any time they are called for.

Now, while the company commander is the directly responsible party for all I have enumerated, he has to assist him his lieutenants and noncommissioned officers, all of whom are necessarily young men and generally men of small incomes. It is unfair that they should be asked to undertake such responsible duties for the benefit of our Nation without some compensation for their labor. It is true the State and National Government supplies the military equipment, but only in part, as for the proper housing and maintaining of it much has to be added to the most successful commands by the members and generous citizens.

Twice each year my State requires a thorough inspection of both property and men as to the condition of the property and the efficiency of the officers, and one annual inspection is made by an Army officer for report to the War Department, making three inspections that have to be gone through with each year. In addition to the drills officers' and noncommissioned officers' schools have to be conducted. The rifle season, conducted from May to October 31 each year, requires an immense amount of work for officers and men. The summer encampment, which usually requires about nine days, while enjoyed by the enthusiastic soldier, is a tour of hard work and requires considerable time immediately prior to the encampment in making preparations for the tour of duty, and also after the return home, in having the property put into condition after the field service that will meet with the approval of the critical eye of the inspector.

The national guardsman who fairly well performs his duties has little or no time for study or recreation other than what he finds in his military work, being required to earn a living as well and expend part of his means for the military work. Therefore it must be apparent to you or all fair-minded men that he should have some compensation for his work. I believe the Government in supporting the National Guard as part of our national defense has made a good move in the right direction, but the step made is just a little short of the best results. The additional expense to be added by allowing drill pay I believe will yield a much greater dividend than has been received or anticipated. It will open a field for a more desirable class of recruits.

Now, while I have directed attention particularly to the work of the very important unit of a military organization—the company commander and his administrative duties and responsibilities—it must be remembered that the whole organization as planned has its duties to perform that are more or less of a task on the time and private incomes of the members of the organization. In my mind the best work that can be accomplished in the National Guard to educate the men to be useful for a national defense, in case such a requirement should occur, is to educate the young man from 18 to 22 or 23 years of age in this service. As to the matter of knowledge, the majority of our able-bodied American boys of that age are without much means, usually commencing their careers at trades or in business, and their incomes are small. Therefore the expense of carfare to attend drills as well as giving up their time from their recreations and study should be considered. It must be borne in mind that the program laid out for the work and study of a national guardsman is not only for a few weeks or months, but the program laid out for him covers the entire year. He is expected to give at least one night a week to instructions and drill in addition to the time he is required to spend on the rifle range and the extra days he serves in the summer encampment without compensation. Here it might be well to say that during the summer encampment payment is made for the time the guardsman is actually in camp, yet there is always a day or two, both before and after the encampment, that is taken up by military work for which he gets no compensation. In the State of Pennsylvania, for instance, the guardsman gets only eight days' pay during the entire year.

I believe it is only fair that the guardsmen of the country should receive the compensation that is asked for in the way of drill pay from the National Congress at the present time, and that it will yield for the National Government a much greater dividend in efficiency if we will add the pay to the present money that is being expended in the line of developing the national guardsmen to be a useful part of the National Army in case their services are required.

For these reasons I am heartily in favor of the enactment of this measure into law.

I submit as part of my remarks the memorandum submitted by Gen. Leonard Wood to the Secretary of War in connection with this bill:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, January 11, 1911.

Herewith is a bill, the purpose of which is to provide Federal pay for the Organized Militia of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia. The enactment of this bill would mark an entirely new departure in military legislation, and because of its far-reaching effects it is probably the most important legislation now under consideration by the War Department.

The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power—

"To raise and support armies, * * *.

"To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

"To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

"To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

Under the authority thus conferred, Congress enacted militia laws in the early days of the Republic which remained substantially unchanged for more than a hundred years. The essential features of the act of May 8, 1792, remained upon the statutes until the enactment of the so-called Dick bill of January 21, 1903, and some of its provisions having been reenacted by the latter law are still in force.

Under the provisions of the act of May 8, 1792, service in the militia appears to have been regarded as a public duty properly required of every citizen, much like that of working on the public roads in certain rural districts. Every able-bodied male citizen between the ages of 18 and 45 years of age, and every such citizen upon attaining the age of 18 years, was required to be enrolled in the militia, to provide himself with arms, ammunition, and equipment, and to render military service for so many days out of the year. This was in effect compulsory military service. The appointment of the officers and the authority of the training of the militia was left to the respective States, but the President was vested with the authority to call the militia into the service of the United States to execute the laws of the Nation, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. He was given authority to issue the call direct to such officers of militia as his judgment should dictate, and provision was made as to the punishment to be imposed in the case of persons of the militia who refused or failed to march to the place of rendezvous. There was no obligation on the part of the Federal Government to accept the services of the militia, but there was every obligation upon the part of the citizen to render militia service. This statement is made at this point in order to emphasize the fact that under the modern existing law these conditions are reversed and the United States is required to accept the services of militia, but there is no obligation on the part of the citizen to serve; at least, no valid obligation which can be effectively enforced.

The fundamental idea of the old militia law was excellent in that it recognized compulsory military service as an obligation owed by the citizen to the Republic, but the detailed methods of carrying this idea into effect were so impracticable that the whole plan proved to be a substantial failure. Beginning with the Revolution and ending with the War with Spain, the militia system has proven a failure in every national conflict, and the only success which has ever come to the American arms has been through the services of the Regular Army and the Volunteers. The great majority of American people make no proper distinction between militia and volunteers. The essential difference is that volunteers are under the exclusive control and jurisdiction of the Federal Government, while the militia is under the joint control and jurisdiction of the Federal Government and the State in which it is organized.

George Washington says:

"To place any dependence upon militia is assuredly resting upon a broken staff."

So severe has been the criticism of militia during every national conflict, that as wars have progressed less and less dependence has been placed upon it, until finally, at the end of every war, the entire burden has in every case been borne by Regulars and Volunteers.

The militia organized under the old laws and the National Guard of to-day, however, are very different; so different, in fact, that it may not be considered altogether fair to class them together. But the improvement goes only so far as the defects in the old laws have been remedied, and the two are identically the same so far as the defects in the old laws have not been remedied.

The principal defects in the old militia laws were as follows:

1. Divided responsibility between the Federal Government and the States: Massachusetts, Connecticut, Vermont, Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, and Arkansas have, through their governors, refused to turn out the militia when called upon by the President to do so. Other States have greatly interfered with the Federal Government in its use of militia either by raising objections and obstacles or by forcing the service of troops not desired.

The modern existing law instead of remedying this defect has intensified it. The old law did not require the President to consult the governors with reference to turning out the militia. He could issue the call direct. As a matter of courtesy, the call was made through the governors. But now it is required by law. There is no way for the Federal Government to coerce the governors, and if any governor should refuse or fail to transmit it to the militia of his State it is easy to see that the whole matter could be thrown into confusion. Moreover, under such conditions it would be impracticable to punish those who failed to answer the call. To make things worse the law requires that the Organized Militia shall be accepted in advance of any volunteers. The Organized Militia is defined by law to be "the regularly enlisted, organized, and uniformed active militia in the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia who have heretofore participated, or who shall hereafter participate, in the apportionment of the annual appropriations provided by section 1661, Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, whether known as National Guard, militia, or otherwise."

With such a loose definition, each separate State could absolutely control the Federal Government with reference to the militia of that State. After the outbreak of war, or when war was imminent, any State could reorganize its militia, change all of its officers, increase or decrease the number of men, discharge or appoint for political reasons, and then force the Government to take the balance. In case of an unpopular war, it is probable that the confusion and difficulties of organizing an army of militia and volunteers would go far beyond anything in our previous history.

Another provision of the existing law is that for those States which have "adopted the standard of medical examination prescribed for the Regular Army," the militia shall be exempt from medical examination upon muster in. There is no requirement as to enforcement, but only as to adoption, and any State can exempt its militia from medical examination by "adopting" the Army medical standard after war is declared. The last report of the Chief, Militia Division, states that all the States except four have adopted the Army medical standard, but very few of them enforce it.

2. Failure or refusal of troops to serve: So great have been the number of cases where organizations and individuals have declined to serve when called, or have raised objections and obstacles to such service, that no consistent effort seems to have ever been made to compel service. Under the act of 1795 any person called into the service of the United States who refused or neglected to present himself for muster was subject to trial by court-martial and punishment as prescribed in the act. There was another act, April 18, 1814, which prescribed that courts-martial "for the trial of militia, drafted, detached, and called forth for service of the United States," should be composed of militia officers only.

In 1820 the Supreme Court (Mr. Justice Washington) decided that since the statute was silent as to who should convene the court, the Federal Government and the States had concurrent jurisdiction. The modern existing law omits to prescribe any definite punishment. Moreover, in prescribing the composition of courts it mentions only the case of militia in the service of the United States, omitting reference to those who are called and refuse to come. The prior existing law is expressly repealed, and the whole question is in worse shape than it was in 1820. These loosely drawn laws, taken together with the fact that there is no uniform enlistment contract, and in some cases practically no contract at all, offer loopholes through which the guilty will undoubtedly escape. Like the provisions discussed under the preceding subhead, they place the Federal Government in such a position that at the moment of greatest danger, when quick decisive action is of the most vital importance, the Federal Government will be powerless to act without the good will and the intelligent cooperation of the chief executives of 50 different States.

3. Lack of discipline: The militia of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, Kentucky, Virginia, Tennessee, and Florida have mutinied in large bodies in the face of the enemy or during the progress of a campaign. With a loss of but 8 killed and 11 wounded, 5,000 militia of Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia were routed by an inferior force and allowed the city of Washington to be captured and burned. Gen. McDowell's entire force of militia fled in panic at the first battle of Bull Run.

These acts, while chargeable to the militia, could be charged equally to any untrained troops. The present Organized Militia can not be classed as such. Their state of discipline is good, and in many cases no doubt they would acquit themselves with the highest credit; but the existing law does not guarantee that the militia which will turn out for war is the militia which turns out for drills and parade in time of peace.

4. Short term of enlistment: Under the old militia laws the militia was usually called out for short terms of from three months to nine months. The result was that it was hardly trained before it was mustered out. Battles have been precipitated because of the approaching termination of enlistments, and whole armies have been mustered out of the service upon the verge of a campaign.

Upon this question Washington said, on January 4, 1776:

"Search the volumes of history through, and I much question whether a case similar to ours is to be found, namely, to retain a post against the flower of the British troops for six months together, without powder, and then to have one army disbanded and another to be raised within the same distance of a reenforced enemy. It is to attempt too much."

In making this comment, Washington referred only to the history of the past. If he had been able to foresee the history of the future, he would have witnessed many similar instances, the latest of which was during the Spanish-American War, when the Volunteers organized under the act of April 18, 1898, were disbanded, to be replaced by those organized under the act of March 2, 1899.

Because of short-term enlistments 576,000 troops were engaged in the War of 1812 against a force of about 18,000. Sixty years after the war the number of pensions was three times the total force of the enemy the first year of the war.

The provisions with reference to short-term enlistments have been improved to a very great extent, but there is a provision that no man shall be held beyond the time of his existing enlistment in the militia. The terms of enlistment and the conditions of discharge are in the control of the States. These two provisions, together with the one which practically requires the acceptance of all militia offered, place the United States in the position of having to accept short-term militia. Thus the situation so much deplored by Washington will, in all likelihood, be repeated.

5. Arms and equipment: The provisions of the old militia law to the effect that every man should provide himself with his own arms, ammunition, and equipment was so impracticable that it is hardly worthy of discussion. There is a real significance, however, in the fact that such a provision is essentially different from one which requires not only that he should be supplied by the Federal Government with arms, ammunition, and equipment, but in addition should receive Federal pay.

Under the act approved January 21, 1903, as subsequently amended by the act of May 27, 1908, there has been a complete reorganization of the militia with reference to organization, arms, and equipment. The recommendations of Washington in this matter have finally been put into effect, and the organization, arms, equipment, and training of the militia is required by law to conform to that of the Regular Army.

To sum up: The peace organization of the militia, its discipline, training, arms, equipment, esprit de corps, and real efficiency have been wonderfully improved. Its officers and men are zealous, patriotic, and enthusiastic, not only willing and anxious to perfect themselves in their duties, but bright, intelligent, and capable; but they stand in the position of a willing team in a rotten harness.

The war organization is worse than it has ever been. That is to say, the laws governing the transition from peace to war, from the service of the State to the service of the United States, are more indefinite and more liable to lead to confusion and embarrassment than they ever were in the past.

Remedy: The remedy is to follow the advice of Washington: In time of peace prepare for war. In time of peace the Organized Militia should enter a definite contract which could be legally enforced. It should be inspected, accepted, and listed, and the United States should be relieved of all obligation to accept the service of any militia other than that listed prior to the outbreak of war.

The Federal pay bill: The enactment of the Federal pay bill would place the Organized Militia in the first line of national defense. It would give us, at little expense, a substantial addition to the permanent military establishment. But it seems only fair to require that there shall be some definite, tangible, and positive return for the investment. A high state of efficiency in the militia will be of little avail if the militia does not turn out in time of war, or if raw recruits are substituted for the trained officers and men.

In order to guarantee to the United States a positive return for the money invested in pay to the militia, it is recommended that the bill be amended by the addition of the following proviso at the end of section 5, namely:

"Provided, That no money appropriated under the provisions of this act shall be paid to any person who is not suited to the military service according to the standards prescribed by the Secretary of War, nor shall any such money be paid to any person who has not taken the oath of allegiance to the United States, including an agreement to render military service to the United States during any period for which he may be called into such service, and any officer or enlisted man of the militia who, having received pay under the provisions of this act, neglects or refuses, under any pretext whatsoever, to present himself for muster when called into the service of the United States shall be subject to trial by any court-martial which the Secretary of War may direct, and upon conviction shall be adjudged guilty of the crime of desertion and shall be punished as such court-martial may direct: And provided further, That nothing in this act or in any other act shall be construed to require the United States, in time of war, to accept the services of any militia organization or of any person belonging to such organizations unless such organization or person has been regularly inspected, reported fit for military service according to the standard prescribed by the Secretary of War, and so carried upon the rolls of the Adjutant General of the Army."

As thus amended, it is recommended that the bill receive the heartiest support of the War Department and the administration.

Very respectfully,

L. W.,
Major General, Chief of Staff.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NICHOLLS].

Mr. NICHOLLS. Mr. Speaker, along with a number of other Members of the House, and I hope a majority, I am opposed to this measure and desire to see it defeated.

Some of those who have presented the matter and argued for the adoption of this bill have said that it would be an economy. It seems to me that we can not add millions to the expenditures of the Government for purposes of preparation for war and at the same time reduce expenditures. It seems to me that the larger we grow in population and in wealth the more some of our people become afraid, and notwithstanding the hundreds of millions of dollars that are expended each year to protect the country, we have heard Members stand upon the floor of this House and say that we are without defense; that the Japanese and other nations might come in at any moment and overwhelm us. What has been done with all the hundreds of millions of dollars, if we are not prepared? Why waste any more of the hard-earned money of the people along these lines? Notwithstanding our tremendous increase in population, the expenditures per capita for purposes of war, preparation for war, and on account of wars that are passed are continually increasing, and those per capita expenses are now greater than at any time in the history of the Government.

In looking up some data a year ago I noticed that in 1861 the expenditure per capita for all the people in the United States—men, women, and children—was $1.17 for the Army, the Navy, and pensions. For the year ending June 30, 1910, it was $4.80. I think it would amount to about $2 per month for the average family of five. In all other lines of business it is a fact that the greater the establishment, the larger the business, the more cheaply it can be conducted per unit; but in this case the larger we grow the more the burden is upon each member of the Nation, and that seems to me to be a ridiculous proposition. When we were much smaller in population our forefathers and those who inhabited the country at that time were able to take care of it and preserve it and to extend its boundaries until it reached from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Although the Regular Army has been increased over 100 per cent in recent years, there are those who favor a further increase in numbers; 125,000 being the present ambition of some. Rather than the recent increases in numbers, I believe it would have been wiser to have given better pay to the privates, so that men would remain in the Army and become thorough soldiers. As it is, the pay is small and one term is enough for most of them.

While our alarmists are crying out of danger from foreign foes, the press dispatches from abroad quote members of the German and other parliaments as urging increases of armament because of our great increases. We are the one great Nation, best situated, by reason of our isolation, to set an example for peace to the rest of the world. We need not wait to be followers.

Let us stop in a great measure these wasteful expenditures for war and spend more for peaceful pursuits. We should loan money to our people at reasonable rates of interest—2 per cent—and enable them to stock for cultivation the land which is being reclaimed by the Government. Our citizens will go on the land when financially enabled. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania was much more painfully candid than the other gentlemen who have been discussing this bill. He admitted that it would virtually increase the standing Army to about 175,000 men. That is exactly what this bill does. It destroys absolutely every vestige of the State Militia as known in the Constitution. But I do not expect, Mr. Speaker, to discuss this feature of the matter in the very short time that is allotted to me. I want to warn the gentlemen of this House that you will be placing in the hands of the War Department a political force and a political organization that is infinitely more dangerous than any other peril in the Government. Because in every community you may not only destroy the high personnel of the militia with this bill, but you will increase the number of undesirable enlistments in order that they may get the small pay of about $4 a month; and each of these organizations will multiply for the purpose of obtaining the $4 a month, and after they shall have been in the State Militia for a short time and have drilled one night in a week, or 52 drills in a year, then they will demand increased pay.

The Secretary of War, through the War Department, can communicate through every adjutant general, and he with the colonels, and they with the captains, and the Army will in this way build up a political influence that will be supported by all the relatives of the members of the militia in every community throughout the country, and you will have every military company in every congressional district demanding of every Congressman to vote to increase the salary to half pay for the militia. And if a Member of Congress takes a patriotic position and says, "I will not make this new raid on the Treasury," and then his opponent, who may have a little strength, tells the boys that he will give them half pay, they will fill the Halls of Congress with their friends, and by joining hands with the other employees of the Government, the Treasury will go out of your control and go into the hands of the employees of the Government.

Why, even now the rural letter carriers, who are few in number, are able to build fires under Congressmen here, and you see how readily and how willingly they vote for increased pay. You let these men strike hands with the little militia companies throughout the country and begin a demand for increased pay, and they in turn join with the fourth-class postmasters, and the fourth-class postmasters join the other employees, and you are placing a political power in the hands of the people who draw salaries to the extent that it will be doubtful whether Congress will be able to control the expenses of the Government.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think that Congress ought to be made strong enough to resist any such demand?

Mr. SISSON. It does not seem to be, when the State militia of his own district now has influence enough to get the gentleman to be very enthusiastic over this bill. You will have to get stronger timber than the gentleman is to resist the increased appeal on the part of the State militia after it has been increased under the provisions of this bill. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I have not more time. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take the time of the House in discussing this question. I want to say that I am most heartily and earnestly in favor of this bill, as I think it will add to the efficiency of the National Guard of the United States. I am confident that it will add greatly to the efficiency of the National Guard in the great State of Pennsylvania. I am proud of the National Guard of Pennsylvania. We have an organization there that the citizens are proud of, and I am anxious to see that guard increased in any way that is possible. I remember with a great deal of pleasure, when the Spanish-American War broke out, the call made upon Pennsylvania was filled instantly by members of the National Guard. We had an army ready equipped, drilled, efficient, which started forth, and they did not require months of drilling to bring a mob into Army efficiency. We had a National Guard ready, earnest, and willing to defend the country. I therefore am most heartily in favor of the measure and hope it will become a law.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a good deal of a scare about the militia this afternoon. I have heard it said by two gentlemen that there is a provision in the Constitution of the United States requiring the States to drill the militia. I do not find it. It is not there. In the preparation of the Constitution of the United States one of the things most prominently considered was to give to the Chief Executive of the United States the control of the militia. In speaking of the power of the President the Constitution of the United States reads:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States.

Now, this militia service is distinguishable from the Volunteer Army such as we have had from time to time when we have gone to war.

The power was given to the President of the United States to command the militia, and that implies a right if not a duty to have a militia. Early in the history of this country all of the States, I think, were required to have common muster days every year, and there were penalties attached to those within a prescribed age for not attending the musters. I am old enough to have gone to an old-fashioned muster. The Constitution is also plain on these subjects. Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, speaking of the powers that are granted, it is provided that Congress shall have the right—> to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

It does not necessarily include the regular forces. Also the same article of the Constitution of the United States grants to the President the right—> to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

And also:

> To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia.

It seems to me there is no difficulty about the constitutional powers.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. KEIFER. Not now. Mr. Speaker, I have always been a stickler for State rights. I believe in the right of the States over those matters which are exclusively within their jurisdiction, but where the Constitution gives a specific right to the Federal Government and the States have the same rights, then the United States asserting its right is supreme, and that is all there is of it. If we are to depend in the future as we have in the past upon the Volunteer Army, let us prepare the militia so that when called into service, as they may be under the provisions of this bill if it becomes a law, they will be drilled and trained, so that they will be ready for battle and for duty. That is the whole question involved here to-day. Some say we are going to take away the right and power of the States over the militia, but I say the bill will take no power from them. The militia will still be and remain State troops, and I think in every instance under the constitution of every State in the Union the governor of the State will remain commander in chief of the militia unless the time comes when they may be called or mustered into the Volunteer Army of the United States. The provisions of the bill are only the ordinary ones with reference to the power of the Secretary of War to reject an organization or a man if not found up to the proper standard of efficiency. Such is the law now, and this bill, should it become a law, will not change it. The provisions of the bill are wise ones.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of legislation which will increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, but I am unwilling to vote a dollar which will result in increasing the Regular Army; and if I believed this bill were in the interest of the National Guard, I would be in favor of it, but it carries with it provisions which, in my judgment, will render inefficient instead of efficient the National Guard of the States. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] have advocated this bill on the ground of economy. I can not see where the economy comes in. If by the passage of this bill we could take from the expenses of the Regular Army, I might be inclined to vote for it, but we must appropriate the same amount of money for the Regular Army that you now appropriate, and you are going to appropriate in addition what this bill authorizes for the National Guard.

What are the influences behind this bill? The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] says that this bill is advocated by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, and I believe this bill never would have seen the light of day and never would have left the committee room unless the amendments suggested by the War Department had been put upon it. What is the history of this legislation? This originally was a bill prepared at a national convention of the National Guard of this country, and when it came to Congress for its approval it was sent to the War Department, and the War Department declined to approve it until they prepared an amendment which placed the National Guard of this country entirely under the administration of the War Department and makes the National Guard a part of the Regular Army.

The amendment proposed by the War Department provides that "no money appropriated under the provisions of this act shall be paid to any person who is not suited to the military service according to the standards prescribed by the Secretary of War." What does this mean? It means that every officer and enlisted man now in the Organized Militia can be dismissed by the Secretary if they do not comply with regulations and standards prescribed by him. The States and their regulations would be entirely ignored and set aside.

Mr. Speaker, the military men of this country—a large portion of them—are seeking to build up in this country a military spirit. [Applause.]

I know that the Chief of Staff and those under him are constantly telling this Congress, and the people of this country, that we must build up a great force in this country in order to repel—what? Who is undertaking to hurt us or make us afraid? There is no danger from any source of which I know. Why, the very fact that in three days we agreed to a treaty with Japan shows that there is no danger from that country [applause], and the fact that no other country in the world is undertaking to do any harm to us or to interfere with us shows that there is no necessity for all this talk about war and the preparation for war. This is another scheme to add to and magnify the importance of the Army. It is not done for and it will not result in the efficiency of the National Guard. The very amendment proposed by the War Department contains in it, as has been so well said by gentlemen who have preceded me, provisions of the most outrageous character. Why, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] said in answer to a question from the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] that the reason why they did not require from the enlisted men in the Regular Army an agreement that they should serve the country was because they have to serve during the term of their enlistment. Why, of course; but this provision provides that after the man has served his term of enlistment he must be at the beck and call of the United States, and that he can not escape from it under any pretext whatever. It is not a parallel case at all to the enlisted man in the Army. The enlisted man in the Army receives four times the pay and all the allowances of an enlisted man, which the National Guardsman does not receive at all, and yet he is compelled to sign an agreement to serve after his term of enlistment has expired. But there is another provision in this bill, and that is the amendment proposed by the Committee on Rules to strike out the words "shall be adjudged guilty of the crime of desertion and" and insert, in line 14, "on the charge of desertion." It does not change the character of it at all.

Mr. DALZELL. If the gentleman will permit, that was put in the bill the other day before the House, and the bill in all particulars, except the one I explained, is as voted on in the House.

Mr. HAY. Then it makes a provision that a man can be tried for desertion, and pains and penalties and imprisonment inflicted upon him. He can have no pretext or excuse whatever if he does not respond to the call, even in time of peace. The provision does not apply only in time of war, but it applies at all times.

Mr. STEENERSON rose.

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman desire to ask a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire to say the language is the same as in the Revised Statutes in effect, and as contained in the present law. This simply provides that the court-martial shall have jurisdiction, and in the existing law there is no court-martial provided for.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman does not mean to say there is anything in the Revised Statutes which provides that after a man has served his term of enlistment he can be court-martialed as a deserter?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I thought the gentleman was asking about the court-martial.

Mr. HAY. Not at all.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, if I thought this bill abridged in the slightest detail the power of the States and the State officials over the National Guard I would not give it my support. There is absolutely no change in existing law provided for in this bill relative to the present duties of the National Guard of the various States. This bill provides for a certain new departure for partial compensation on the part of the National Government to the National Guard, and is the only provision in this bill, so far as I have been able to ascertain, relating to the rules prescribed for the payment of the money to the National Guard. It makes provision that under certain rules and regulations the Secretary of War shall be authorized to make this partial compensation or payment to the enlisted men and officers of the National Guard. It does not transfer the power of giving orders to the National Guard from the State officials, it does not vest in the Secretary of War any additional power whatever in calling out the National Guard. It simply provides that if men fail to respond when they are called out, if they have received pay from the National Government, a court-martial can be instituted. Why, when the National Guard is called out in the States to-day, if a man fails to respond he can be arrested and tried by court-martial just the same as is provided in this law. They say that it is going to give the Secretary of War additional power by giving him the discretion to determine which regiments and organizations shall be accepted in case of war.

That has always been the law of the United States. I fancy that when the National Guard was called out at the time of the opening of the Spanish-American War the Secretary of War was not compelled, without discretion, to accept all troops, whether they measured up to a certain standard or not. Certainly not. That power has always been in the hands of the Secretary of War, and no change whatever is made relative to that power in this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my time has expired, and I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON].

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, it is a pity that this simple bill should be unnecessarily complicated through the discussion on the floor of this House, particularly on this side of the Chamber. The bill is very simple in providing for a limited compensation to the National Guard, under reasonable restrictions and conditions for discipline. It is acceptable to both the National Guard and to the Secretary of War in its present state. It has been developed by the combined views of both, and it should not be misunderstood. It does not put too heavy restrictions upon the National Guard and put it too much in the power of the Secretary of War. It simply requires reasonable discipline.

On the other hand, it does not give too much compensation to the National Guard. It is limited and reasonable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a pity that every time we come to discuss measures here on their merits, Members on this side should get up and talk about war, militarism, and the military spirit. The truth is that this country is committed to a non-military policy, and ought to be. We embody a civilization that depends upon the citizen as a soldier, and not upon a standing regular army. And furthermore, it is vital to the permanent success of our institutions that the citizen soldiery, when it is called out in a great struggle in the future, whenever that comes or against whatever nation, against a great military system, it is of vital importance to the perpetuity of our liberal institutions that the citizen soldiers should actually be found efficient; because if they are not, if they turn out as they did in the War of 1812 and in previous wars, and this Nation is humiliated beyond anything in its history in the contact with a great military power, then, emerging from that war, we will no longer put trust in the citizen soldiery, but will go to the standing army, like the other great nations of the world. And the fact is, to put the citizen soldiery on a basis of efficiency is the least we can do as a safeguard and as a guaranty to the efficiency of that soldiery, and therefore against its being taken away in the future and being substituted with a great military system.

We should not found this on any such proposition. Even if war did not come for decades, it ought to be a part of our permanent institution to organize our citizen soldiery as the bulwark of our Nation's defense and see that it is efficient.

Beginning with the Dick bill, we have started along the right line to make the National Guard efficient. I have heard it estimated that the efficiency of the National Guard has increased fully 100 per cent since the passage of that bill. And throughout the whole of the land we find that the trouble with our National Guard now is that we can not get hold of the men, we can not ask them to come even and pay their car fares; there is no way that we can get them except by persuasion and an appeal to their pride, and that, of course, in time of peace is very difficult. The great trouble now is to get men to attend drills. With this we would overcome this element of difficulty.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, in the one minute I have I simply desire to call attention of the House to the fact that its judgment has already been had on the merits of this proposition. On Thursday last a motion was made to suspend the rules and pass this bill. Pending that motion, the bill was explained and debated, and the vote resulted in a majority for the bill of in the neighborhood of 50.

At that time opposition was made to the bill in some quarters because section 5 contained an indefinite permanent appropriation. But in the rule reported from the Committee on Rules there has been a section added to this bill, section 6, in these words:

The Secretary of War shall annually estimate the amount necessary for the carrying out of this act, and no money shall be expended hereunder except as it shall be from time to time appropriated.

So that that objection to the bill has been eliminated, and there is no reason, therefore, why the House ought not now to emphasize the action that it took on Thursday last and pass this bill by an increased majority. I call for the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. General debate has expired.

Mr. CALDER. It is not my purpose to discuss the measure now under consideration. I am, however, very much in favor of it. I believe it will tend to improve the efficiency of our State militia. The citizen soldiery of the country has been its bulwark in its hour of need, and this measure will do much to keep our State troops in a state of preparedness. I propose taking advantage of leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a brief sent to me by Mr. George F. Buente, formerly a warrant officer in the United States Navy, giving his views on House bills 18020 and 25714. These bills are in the interest of the warrant officers of the Navy and were introduced by me early last session. I have repeatedly requested the Committee on Naval Affairs to grant me a hearing on these bills, but have been unable to obtain consideration for either of them. I propose introducing them in the Sixty-second Congress, and am hopeful that both bills may receive favorable action in that Congress.

House bills 18020 and 25714 were introduced for the purpose of giving to warrant gunners, boatswains, and carpenters a little more pay in their later years, and also distinguishing titles which will identify them against various pothunters and others who have the name of gunners and boatswains, which are the present titles of some of the warrant officers whom these bills are intended to advance.

To become warrant officers in the Navy, especially with the rank of boatswain and gunner, it is necessary that a young man shall enlist, and, under the law, must serve at least seven years before he can take an examination for the warrant rank, and must also have arrived at the position of a first-class or chief petty officer before he can take the examination for the warrant rank. When he has passed the above qualifications he must then apply to his commanding officer for permission before taking this examination and run the risk of having his application approved or not. Not securing this approval his future chances of advancement are broken and we have a dissatisfied employee. But should he be fortunate enough to have his application accepted he is then examined.

The board who examines these candidates are composed of commissioned officers of the line, and the examination which they have to undergo is a very severe one. They are assigned to serve at least one year at sea and it frequently happens that owing to the position which they are in, this period is sometimes deferred a year or more, and must then have the approval of all their commanding officers under whom they have served, which sometimes works to the disadvantage of the applicant. They must then serve a period of six years from the date of their warrants before they are eligible for further advancement. After the expiration of this period they are again examined for the position of chief in the various grades and in the event of their passing these examinations are given a commission with the title of chief boatswain, chief gunner, chief carpenter, and so forth, and have the rank with but after ensign. The officer at this time has arrived at the age of approximately 35 years, and has served, using the average class of boatswain in the Navy, about 17 years. It is in this period of a man's life that his mental and physical powers are at their maximum, and it is also at this period that they arrive at a point where their ambition is killed for the reason that future promotion or advancement of pay is denied them with the exception of very isolated cases where some of these men have been further promoted to the rank of ensign in the Navy. The above we can well consider as the end of the ambitions of the young men who enter the Navy through the ranks.

We will now take up briefly what happens to a young man who enters the naval service through the academy at Annapolis. These young men are selected by regularly constituted officers of the United States and are then ordered to Annapolis. After having passed satisfactory examination they are admitted to the Naval Academy under instructions. The course at the academy is four years, and upon their graduation are sent to sea for two years for further instructions. Upon the completion of this sea duty they are commissioned ensigns of the Navy, which position they hold for three years, and are then promoted to lieutenant (junior grade). Owing to existing conditions in the upper grades of the line in most every case these young men are promoted almost immediately to full lieutenant. These young men have now arrived at the age of approximately 28 years and their career has just begun.

THE MANIFOLD DUTIES OF THESE OFFICERS.

The chief boatswain—the proposed equipment ensign—is the right hand of the executive officer, who is also the equipment officer on board the modern battleship, and so forth, and under his direction receives and cares for all equipment stores and outfit, handling of crew, anchors, chains, and so forth, storing of boats and holds, in charge of decks, standing deck watches, and drilling of crew. In addition to the above, this officer is subject to call in the performance of various other responsible and important duties appertaining to a battleship, or other ships of the Navy, and is often placed in command of seagoing tugs and other small vessels of the naval service, and while on shore he frequently acts as assistant inspector of equipment, and so forth.

The chief gunner—the proposed ordnance ensign—is the valuable assistant to the ordnance officer and receives and cares for all ordnance stores and outfit, including guns of all descriptions, gun mounts and their appurtenances, all ammunition, submarine mines, torpedoes, and diving apparatus. He personally inspects daily all magazines, shell rooms, and all explosives appertaining to both the great guns, secondary batteries, and small arms, as well as torpedoes and submarine mines. He is held responsible for their readiness for action at all times. He is also assistant to the navigator in the care of the electric plant on board ship, including the electric wiring, dynamos, search and signal lights. He is also an expert diver, and has charge of all diving done from ships in commission. He is frequently placed in charge of a deck watch and division duty, drilling of crew, and in command of tugs, torpedo boats, and submarine boats, and in charge of, or assistant, at magazine and powder depots on shore, and as assistant inspector of ordnance at navy yards and contractors' plants. They are the assistants of the navigator and the executive officer of the ship, but really perform these duties and are held responsible for the various conditions committed to their grade.

An ensign after graduation acts as assistant to the deck officer and occasionally drills the lower divisions in the ships in which there are not a sufficient number of lieutenants or watch officers when they assume their various duties. They really are in the position of a postgraduate course in practical man-of-war's-man ship. The officers with the rank of lieutenant are the watch and division officers of the ship, each drilling his division in the various duties and taking his regular term in having charge of the deck during the period that he is aboard ship, none of the duties of which are considered technical or beyond the capabilities of the chief boatswain or chief gunner. At this point, gentlemen, I want to call to your attention the fact that the duties demanded of the ensign and junior lieutenant are also undertaken and performed by warrant officers and commissioned chiefs in the duties according to their grades, which would show you, gentlemen, that up to this point in their careers the warrant officers and commissioned chiefs are compelled to do exactly the same duty, in addition to other men's duties, laid down by the regulations; so that, in the event of there being no line officers in this grade, the warrant officers and commissioned chiefs have been educated to the point where they will take up the work of the officer in this grade.

The pay of the lieutenant at approximately 28 years of age is $2,400 per annum; the pay of the commissioned chief at 37 years is $1,700 and rank as ensign of the Navy. It seems, in view of the duties demanded of these officers, that these men have educated themselves to the point where they have performed the same duties as those educated by the Government at the cost of $30,000 each. Up to this point I have paralleled the duties of these two grades of officers, showing the duties of each and also the amount which the Government expended on these officers for their services, the one officer serving nine years and the other 17 years. A further duty assigned to the warrant officers and commissioned chiefs, which is of recent arrangement, is in connection with the boards of inspection throughout the various navy yards, and so forth, where their services are demanded. To each of these boards of inspection is appointed a line officer above the rank of lieutenant, whose duties, as I understand it, is for the inspection of all materials manufactured by the Government and under the Government's specifications. This work is naturally of a technical nature, and it is very rarely that any man at the age of 40 may become proficient in all the lines covered by an inspection officer (especially where they have had little experience on account of their duty continually on shipboard), which goes to make up the work appointed by the Government.

The duty of inspecting these various materials and apparatus devolves on the warrant officer and commissioned chief on account of their special fitness for this particular branch of work. After the work has been inspected by these officers, their reports are submitted to the officer, as we shall designate the chief inspector. The report invariably follows on the lines recommended by the practical men. The very fact that these men are assigned to these duties indicates the department's knowledge of their peculiar fitness for it, which I urge upon the gentlemen of the Naval Committee.

Throughout the various training stations where technical training of the enlisted force is necessary, the warrant officers, commissioned chiefs, and petty officers are the instructors in every case, the classes being nominally under the officer of the line, but the duties of instruction devolving entirely upon the gentlemen whom this bill will benefit. You will notice in both of the paragraphs above that a line officer is nominally in charge, but the actual work being performed by the warrant officers and the commissioned chiefs. Another duty to which these officers are assigned is the command of the various Naval Militia vessels which the Government has turned over to the various States and in whose care both officers and enlisted men are instructed in the duties demanded of them by the warrant officers and commissioned chiefs. These seagoing officers are further placed in command of Government vessels, and valuable property of the Government is intrusted to their care.

Another very important duty is the storing and preparing of the ammunition for the service, the duty of which devolves upon these officers, and the preparing of the stations for the various storehouses and magazines, and in a great many instances have been entirely revised and adopted by the Government upon the recommendation of the warrant officer and commissioned chief stationed there, thus showing that the training of enlisted personnel throughout the service, both technically and practically up to the point of reaching the grade of commissioned chief, is done by these officers.

In connection with the duties of these warrant officers and commissioned chiefs it is very noticeable that the title with which they have been dubbed in the past is very misleading and not appropriate.

The proposed change in titles is in line with the vast changes in the Navy from the old to the new. It is fully realized that the title of boatswain and gunner is a tradition as old as the Navy itself; so are the wooden sailing frigates, and so forth, with their rigging, sails, and deck tackle, smoothbore guns and wooden carriages, hemp breeches, side and train tackles, and crude ammunition. In fear, therefore, of traducing tradition it is thought best not to ask that the title of boatswain and gunner be abolished, but the title of chief boatswain and chief gunner being comparatively of recent origin, it is thought perhaps there would not be the same sentiment against the change.

It is claimed that the title of chief boatswain or boatswain, chief gunner or gunner, carpenter or chief carpenter, is now a misnomer in the Navy, as it certainly does not clearly designate the present duties assigned to these officers, either afloat or ashore. To the novice or civilian it is construed to mean that the chief gunner is the chief gun pointer, or the man who fires the gun. This erroneous idea is obtained from the daily press, which invariably dubs all gunners as men who fire the guns, such as gunners and master gunners of the Army, gun pointers of the Navy, as well as bird and trap shooters in the field of sports. In their category, anyone who fires a gun of any kind or shape is to them a gunner. Hence, when a chief gunner or gunner in the Navy is catechized as to his official position in the naval service invariably the question is asked, Are you one of the men who fire the guns? And generally it is a hard matter to convince them otherwise.

It is true the title of equipment ensign might not be as applicable to chief boatswain as ordnance ensign to chief gunner; nevertheless chief boatswains also suffer from the ambiguousness of their present titles. Therefore it is thought that the proposed title of equipment ensign would be in line with the title of ordnance ensign and more applicable to their present duties, as well as avoiding friction or objection at the Navy Department, both grades being included in one recommendation.

It is thought and strongly urged that the proposed change of title from chief boatswain, chief gunner, and chief carpenter to that of equipment, ordnance, and carpenter ensign would clarify somewhat and define the present ambiguous titles now held by these officers, bringing to them a more satisfactory and dignified title and properly classifying them in accordance with the manifold duties assigned to them in their respective departments.

These new titles will not in any way conflict with the titles now held by either the present line or staff officers, but will at once place them in a class where they professionally belong, and give to them an official designation which will clearly define what they are and what duties they perform.

Referring to section 4 of the proposed bills presented, which provides that the equipment, ordnance, and carpenter ensign after 30 years' service, and having served 10 years as a commissioned officer with a creditable record, shall upon retirement be retired as equipment, ordnance, and carpenter lieutenant, respectively. Perhaps this section may appear to be paradoxical when referring to the claim of the officers concerned that they do not ask in their bill for increased rank, but it should be recognized that this proposed increased rank on the retired list is merely an honorary title, and which will not in any way conflict with rank or precedence of those of the line on the active list; thus it could not meet the same objection as if it referred to the active list. Therefore it is earnestly solicited that your committee will see its way clear to approve this concession as a reward of merit to these officers for their long and faithful service, as well as to place them in a dignified position during their honorable old age.

You will note that this bill positively does not ask for any additional rank for any of these officers except for the honorary rank at the time of 35 years' service, when he retires; and, gentlemen, let me tell you that the Government would be lax in its judgment of these officers if it did not give them some small remuneration after spending their entire life in its service. Concerning the modest request of the bill in the matter of financial increase, it seems that the pay and allowance of these commissioned officers is insufficient for their common existence at the present time when the country is in arms at the exorbitant price for the necessities of life, and they have stood in the same relative position during the past 10 years notwithstanding the fact that the increase in cost of existence has in most cases increased 100 per cent. Is it, then, asking too much to advance them upon a fair and reasonable pay after a willing and faithful service when the same pay, including rank, has been given to the young men whose services have not been one-tenth the value of these faithful men, and who have, in the meantime, probably been trying to raise a family in the way that naval officers should raise one?

It would also act as a strong incentive to the enlisted petty officers and others to aspire to the warrant grades, which they do not do as a class. It would also give them a future to look forward to in their naval career. Likewise there should be an equal incentive to all who reach the commissioned grade of chief. These officers have no future whatever before them, they having reached the height of all preferment at an average age of 35 years, receiving an annual salary, including longevity, amounting to less than that received by a young lieutenant (junior grade) just commissioned, and this is all they have to look forward to during their whole future in the naval service, while the young lieutenants, by rapid promotion, leave them far behind in a few years. By way of illustration, the chief gunner now heading his grade on the active list was appointed gunner in 1870, and all midshipmen who graduated in that year and now in the service are either rear admirals or captains.

It seems to me that the Navy Department is very shortsighted in not lifting these men up a notch rather than their studied position retarding their advancement. This would be the means of the enlisted forces of the Navy taking a greater interest in their duties and probably an incentive for the future reenlistments which the Navy at present is in such a need. On this point let me quote you from the Navy Department records showing a reenlistment during the year 1909. This table is taken from the United States Naval Institute Proceedings, No. 132, December, 1909, volume 35. We had in the service at that time some 40,000 men, of whom approximately 30,000 were in their first enlistment, 5,800 in their second enlistment, and 1,600 in their third enlistment.

This will show conclusively to you gentlemen that there is not sufficient inducement in the Navy at present to demand the interest and self-sacrifice of the enlisted personnel, and something must be done by which they will be stimulated, so that the Navy can have in time of need a sufficient number of trained man-of-war's men. It is a well-known fact that it requires at least two enlistments to make a man-of-war's man, and if out of a total of 40,000 only 1,000 reenlist you have but a nucleus of 2 per cent to do the work. Is not this deplorable? Let us now take up in short order the United States Revised Statutes, as follows:

Congress by act of March 3, 1899, gave the chief boatswains, and so forth, the rank of ensign, but the Navy Department, through Navy regulations, had delegated these officers just one notch below all ensigns. When I say the Navy Department I mean the leading officers stationed at the Navy Department. These officers are advisers to the Secretary of the Navy, and as such prepare and give him all the information on any subject that he wishes. Whether these officers have been true to their trust, I will let you gentlemen judge from my arguments, as will follow.

The act of March 3, 1899, created the different corps of commissioned chiefs, viz, chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief carpenters, and chief sailmakers.

The act of April 27, 1904, changed the act of March 3, 1899, reducing the time to six years. That commendable law gave some promotion and would have been very efficient had the Navy Department carried out the law as it stands on the statute books, and with the same spirit which prompted Congress to enact that law. But instead, the Navy Department, by regulations, and so forth, has interpreted the law to cheapen the grades of chiefs.

First. As to the status of rank and precedence. The law states "to rank with but after ensign." The Navy Department has interpreted that to mean that all ensigns rank ahead of and take precedence over all chiefs. The chiefs claim, and I think justly so, that is not the law. The law says that they shall have the rank of ensign, and "with but after" must mean that each chief comes right after some specific ensign whose commission antedates the commission of that particular chief. That is the Navy Department's interpretation of all other officers, such as civil engineers, paymasters, and so forth, who rank with ensign. Why this discrimination against the chiefs? The ensign and other officers of similar rank outrank the chiefs after three years' service, when they are promoted to the grade of junior lieutenant. It certainly is not justice to give a chief the rank of ensign and then nullify that law by department regulations. Article 28, paragraph 2, United States Navy Regulations, 1909, reads as follows:

> After six years from date of warrant, boatswains, gunners, carpenters, and sailmakers, respectively, if duly qualified, are commissioned chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief carpenters, and chief sailmakers, to rank with but after ensigns. On the active list of the Navy these commissioned warrant officers take precedence after ensigns and of each other according to the dates of their commissions.

This article does not quote the law. The law is, "with but after ensign," and not "with but after ensigns," which puts the plural on ensign. If Congress intended that all chiefs should take precedence after all ensigns, that law would have read "ensigns;" but it reads "ensign," consequently such was not the intent of Congress, and it would certainly not be right to put a class of officers, with an average of about 17 years of service when reaching that grade, behind all ensigns now in the service and that may become ensigns in the future.

Naval Academy graduates are commissioned ensigns after a course of four years at the Naval Academy and a course of two years at sea, or after taking some special course, as at the Polytechnic Institute, at Boston, and these courses are given them at no expense to themselves, but at a public outlay amounting to $30,000 for each one. Officers such as assistant paymasters and civil engineers, who rank with ensigns, are appointed directly from civil life, and therefore receive that rank on their first day of service, whereas chief boatswains and chief gunners have to serve at least seven years at sea as enlisted men before they are eligible for appointment as warrant officers, then six years as warrant officers, when they are promoted to commissioned chief and rank with an ensign, and are then delegated by Navy Regulations to take precedence after all other officers who have the rank of ensign now in the service, or who may in the future be appointed; and no enlisted man is eligible for appointment as a warrant officer who has not served as a first-class or chief petty officer, and has been at sea for at least seven years; so you see they must be the very cream of the enlisted personnel and have a long and weary road to travel, and their education has not cost the public one cent. As a matter of fact the average service as enlisted men of the boatswains and gunners is about 11 years, then 6 years as a warrant officer, thus a total length of service of 17 years before they reach the grade of chief, with the rank with but after ensign, which gives them the pay of an ensign; and there they remain for the rest of their lives.

Second. The titles of the chiefs. The act creating the chief grade gave these officers a positive promotion with a commission with certain titles and are by law chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief carpenters, and chief sailmakers. The Navy Department has by regulations dubbed these officers commissioned warrant officers. This title has been objected to by the commissioned chiefs, and appeals have been made to the Navy Department to that effect, but the Navy Department has refused to change the regulations, thus refusing to obey the law established by Congress. The title "commissioned warrant officers" is very misleading and unjust, as it infers that the chiefs are still warrant officers, which they are not. By law chiefs are commissioned officers with the rank of ensign. To draw the committee's attention to this, the following reading will be found in House bill 27844 in several places when speaking of this class of officers and warrant officers (both commissioned and warranted), which goes to show that the Navy Department consider the commissioned chiefs as warrant officers. Attention is respectfully called to Article XXIV, paragraphs 2, 4, and 5, also Article XXX, United States Navy Regulations, 1909, where these officers are classified by regulations. If the Navy Department is then allowed to classify commissioned chiefs as commissioned warrant officers, why not officers appointed from civil life as "commissioned civilian officers," and so forth, without end. What is the object of the Navy Department to thus classify these officers, and furthermore, contrary to law, but to cheapen the grade of chief and make it generally understood that they are still warrant officers?

Third. The uniform. The chiefs: Although given the rank of ensign by law, the Navy Department has persistently refused to give these officers the uniform to which their rank entitles them. Appeal after appeal has been sent to the Navy Department by these officers that they be allowed the proper uniform of their rank. These appeals have as often been refused by the Navy Department. All other officers in the Navy who have the rank of ensign are allowed the uniform of that rank. Each and every corps in the Navy has a distinctive corps device which is worn on the collar, shoulder marks, and so forth, but the sleeve marks very distinctly designate the rank. An officer with the rank of ensign wears a gold stripe one-half inch on the sleeve. This is not allowed the commissioned chiefs. They wear a gold stripe, but it is broken with blue silk. All officers except the commissioned chiefs are allowed proper full-dress and social-dress uniforms. This is very unjust and humiliating to these officers when they have to appear at official ceremonies, and so forth, and among officers of their own grade in foreign navies, and thus placing them at a disadvantage, very much to their humiliation and discomfort.

Fourth. Their standing as officers in line of command, and so forth. The Secretary of the Navy, in his letter of comments on House bill 18020 to the chairman of your committee, states the following regarding warrant officers: They take rank or precedence next after midshipmen and ahead of all mates. The Secretary is merely quoting paragraph 1, article 28, United States Navy Regulations, which is contrary to law. Section 12 of the act of March 3, 1899, reads, in part, as follows, referring to chief boatswains, chief gunners, and so forth:

> That nothing in this act shall give additional right to quarters or to command.

Therefore it follows that commissioned chiefs with the rank of ensign also take rank and precedence next after midshipmen. Let us see if the Navy Department's interpretation of the law thus quoted in the Navy Regulations is correct. By section 1410, Revised Statutes, there are only the following officers in the Navy, viz, commissioned, warrant, and petty officers. A midshipman does not hold a commission or warrant, and therefore can not be an officer in the Navy as defined by that statute, and justly so. A midshipman is a young man attending a naval school preparing him to be an officer, and it is a fact that no midshipman has the required practical knowledge to command a fighting ship or to command a fighting division aboard of any ship, which takes years of practical experience to acquire under actual service conditions and can not be taught at any school where only the rudiments are taught. After the midshipman has completed his studies he is given a commission as an officer of the lowest commissioned grade in the Navy, which is that of ensign. The warrant officers and commissioned chiefs therefore justly claim that they must certainly come ahead of all midshipmen, both as to command and precedence. The warrant officers and chiefs have raised themselves to these grades by years of hard work and study in the practical school of the service, the ship of war, and have passed through several examinations, and therefore there can be no doubt as to their abilities as officers, both in command and otherwise. Again, I think I have shown to you gentlemen the unfair treatment these officers are receiving at the hands of the Navy Department, and have also shown that the Navy Department has no intention of placing these officers in the proper position they are entitled to according to law. Therefore other laws should be passed and so worded that there possibly can not be any mistake as to what they are entitled to by the various acts of Congress.

COMMENTS ON HOUSE BILL 27844.

Regarding section 51 of House bill 27844, which is a personnel bill now before this committee, and which has the approval of the Secretary of the Navy: The section referred to deals with the warrant officers and commissioned chiefs. Let us examine this section. It will bear me out in what I have stated, that the Navy Department is not giving and does not intend, if they can possibly help it in any way, to give the warrant officers and commissioned chiefs, and consequently the enlisted personnel, a square deal as to promotion.

First. Why should the appointments to the different corps of warrant officers be limited to 20 each year? At present the only corps which is limited to 20 each year is that of the machinist; the department has been unable to obtain that many qualified candidates for machinists each year. At present the grades of boatswains, gunners, and carpenters are not limited, but the President is allowed to appoint the number actually required for the service, and if he chooses he can limit that to 20 each year. Therefore, from the above facts, why this unnecessary legislation?

Second. Section 51 reads, as to the rank, pay, and allowances:

Provided, That the rank, pay, and allowances in the several grades shall be the same as now provided by law for boatswains and chief boatswains, respectively.

The rank we have discussed previously, so you gentlemen know how unjust to these officers the law has been interpreted by the Navy Department in the Navy Regulations. As to pay: The present law provides that this pay in the various corps shall be that of boatswains or the equivalent, so why this unnecessary legislation? As to allowances: If the Navy Department wished to do justice to this, recommendations should have been made so as to include warrant officers in the fuel and light allowance, now allowed by law to all officers excepting the warrant officers. At present all warrant officers are allowed by law two rooms when on shore duty, and when not occupying public quarters they are allowed $12 per room per month, but they are not allowed any light or heat for their rooms, which is allowed all other officers at every station where warrant officers are occupying public quarters. These officers have to pay for light and heat out of their already meager pay, when all other officers stationed at these same stations are furnished both at public expense. This is known to the Navy Department, and comments have been frequently made on this unjust state of affairs. Therefore the department has not done justice to these officers by not recommending the above legislation in section 51.

Third. Section 51 reads:

Provided further, That all warrant officers shall be examined for promotion by such examining boards as the Secretary of the Navy shall designate.

Here, again, is a very unjust and discriminating request by the Navy Department. The Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, in his annual report for several years past, has recommended that the above become a law. The annual report for 1910 reads as follows, on page 7:

The law which provides that warrant officers must be examined by a board consisting of chief warrant officers is often a source of embarrassment to the bureau, as it is difficult and many times impracticable, except at much expense, to assemble such a board, particularly on the Pacific coast. It is frequently impracticable to constitute such a board on foreign stations, and in consequence the examination of officers of these grades is delayed for long periods before an opportunity affords for convening a board. This is an injustice to the officer affected, as he is deprived of the increase in his rank and pay until he is qualified for promotion. The bureau sees no reason why warrant officers should not be examined by a regular examining board, as is the case with all other officers.

It certainly is wonderful that the Navy Department should apparently try to take steps to erase an injustice to these officers, as this report and proposed legislation in section 51 appears to do. But the officers affected claim, and justly so, that this report of the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation is very misleading, and by enacting such laws as is requested in section 51 would be very unjust and discriminating, indeed.

To be able to explain this fully I will have to refer to previous legislation that is now a law on the statute books. As regards the injustice as is claimed in rank and pay by delayed examinations, that is not so. Section 1562, Revised Statutes, clearly defines and eliminates any such injustice, and reads as follows:

If an officer of a class subject to examination before promotion shall be absent on duty, and by reason of such absence or of other cause not involving fault on his part, shall not be examined at the time required by law or regulation, and shall afterwards be examined and found qualified, the increased rate of pay to which his promotion would entitle him shall commence from the date when he would have been entitled to it had he been examined and found qualified at the time so required by law or regulations; and this law shall apply to any cases of this description which may have heretofore occurred, and in every such case the period of service of the party in the grade to which he was promoted shall, in reference to the rate of his pay, be considered to have commenced from the date when he was entitled to take rank.

The above law prevents any such injustice as is claimed.

Section 1491, Revised Statutes, reads as follows:

The President may, if he shall deem it conducive to the interests of the service, give assimilated rank to boatswains, gunners, carpenters, and sailmakers, as follows: After five years' service to rank with ensigns, and after 10 years' service with lieutenants, junior grade.

This commendable law, although somewhat defective in its wording, was put on the statute books by Congress in 1864, and evidently that body thought as early as 1864 that it was to the best interest of the service to give warrant officers more rank. This statute has never been effective and no part of it has ever been carried into effect. Why? Is it not reasonable to suppose that during all these years some of the warrant officers have been worthy of this promotion?

It is due to the very fact that the provisions in that statute evidently were not carried out by the Navy Department; that the present law regulating the examination and promotion of warrant officers was enacted by Congress on March 23, 1899, thus putting the warrant officers on the same status as to examination as is now and has been enjoyed by all other officers of the Navy, as each and every corps in the Navy examine the candidates of their respective corps for promotion; so why the request for this discriminating law against the warrant officers? The warrant officers justly feel that if the change should be made as requested in section 51 by the Navy Department, the effect of the present just law would be null and void, just as section 1491 was ineffective for years.

The examining boards, consisting of commissioned chiefs, have carried out these examinations with credit and fairness, and the candidates appearing before these boards know that they are given a square deal.

Fourth. Section 51:

And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect in any way the present law regulating the appointment of warrant officers (commissioned and warranted) to the grade of ensign, which law shall remain in full effect.

The law referred to is the act of March 3, 1901. The act of March 3, 1903, changed this so as to allow 12 each year. The act of April 27, 1904, reduced the time of service in the warrant grade for the above-mentioned grades and made them eligible for the examination to ensign from six years to four years. The act of March 3, 1909, included chief boatswains, chief gunners, and chief machinists in the above law. The following tables will show how this law has worked for the 10 years since its enactment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I also ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I also ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. General debate has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That under such regulations as the Secretary of War and the National Militia Board may prescribe the commissioned officers of the Organized Militia of each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall receive in compensation for their services, other than at annual encampments or in case of riot, insurrection, or invasion, certain percentages of the annual rate of pay for officers of like grade in the Army of the United States as is now or may be hereafter established by law, as follows: All officers below the grade of general officers, including officers of the Medical Corps serving with troops, 15 per cent, and an additional 5 per cent to the commanding officers of all companies, troops, and batteries; general officers and officers of staff departments serving with general officers, 5 per cent: Provided, That each such officer shall have performed at least 75 per cent of the duties prescribed by statutes or in orders by the commander in chief of his State or Territory or the commanding general of the Organized Militia of the District of Columbia, excepting for services hereinbefore excluded: Provided further, That no officer shall be entitled to such compensation until he shall have passed such examination as shall be prescribed for officers of that grade by the Secretary of War and the National Militia Board.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 10, after the word "now," strike out the words "or may be hereafter."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, what is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. The first amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I now move to strike out the section—section 1.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to sound a discordant note on this bill upon this side of the House, but I do not believe it is a wise measure. Not only that, I believe it is a very unwise measure from almost every standpoint. It seems that the people of this country are talking more about peace and doing less toward its real advancement than the people of any other great country in the world. Since I have been a Member of this body the Regular Army has been increased about 300 per cent, and the expense of its maintenance has been increased, I should say, more than 300 per cent. I voted for nearly every measure that looked toward the reorganization of the Regular Army and the promotion of its efficiency because I believed it was in the interest of the country.

This measure deals with the State militia, the so-called National Guard. I am opposed to it because I believe, with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], that its effect will be to practically destroy the State militia as it has existed in this country for a hundred years or more. It will take from the young men of the country——

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER (continuing). That spirit of patriotism and local pride that has prompted them in times past to enlist in the militia, and its tendency will be to convert that military or semimilitary organization into an organization of professional soldiers.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to ask the gentleman if he thinks the militia in our last and previous wars has been efficient, and if he would be satisfied with the standard of efficiency displayed in our past wars?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the militia has been more satisfactory in the past than the militia of the future will be, if this character of legislation is carried to its logical conclusion. The appropriations out of the Federal Treasury, of course, must necessarily carry with them a corresponding increase of the duties and obligations of the members of the militia and a corresponding increase of military service and discipline. Complaint is being made all over the country now that it is exceedingly difficult to secure recruits for the militia. And why? Because of the movement to place it under control of the Federal Government in times of peace. The so-called Dick law initiated the movement, and this bill, if it becomes a law, will accentuate the difficulties. The young men who will enlist in the militia in the future will be the class of men who would ordinarily go into the Regular Army—men who desire to become professional soldiers, and not the class of young men who would be prompted to become members of State military organizations from a sense of love of country. Men pursuing the occupations of peace are not inclined to subject themselves to the rigid discipline of the Regular Army, and therefore they will decline to go into the militia under Federal regulation and control with the court-martials and severe penalties provided in this bill. Officers of State military organizations are supporting this measure. It will increase their importance from the military standpoint and will carry some compensation for their service, but when it is generally known what exactions are required, where will the privates come from?

The question of cost is one of no inconsiderable consequence. We propose now to give the State Militia a certain percentage of the pay that is given to officers and soldiers in the Regular Army, and it has been said, with a great deal of reason, that it is but the entering wedge. We propose to pay enlisted men and noncommissioned officers 25 per cent of what is paid enlisted men and noncommissioned officers in the Regular Army.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Who has charge of this bill now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] or myself?

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House take charge, under the five-minute debate.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, am I entitled to the remaining five minutes?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will bring himself under the rule.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Under the Dick law, passed a few years ago, a charge upon the Federal Treasury of $4,000,000 a year for the State militia was imposed. It has been stated on the floor in general debate, without contradiction, that this bill will involve an expenditure of $6,000,000 a year in addition, and it provides for the payment of only one-fourth of the compensation paid the soldiers in the Regular Army, and 15 or 20 per cent of the salaries paid to Regular Army officers.

I have had experience enough in national affairs, and sufficient observation of the tendency of legislation of this character, to firmly believe that within five years an effort will be made again in Congress, a successful effort, to double the appropriations that are carried in this bill, because in that time the argument will be stronger than it is to-day that some additional inducements are necessary in order to secure enlistments in the National Guard, and the increase will doubtless be made. Do young men now become members of the National Guard in the hope of emoluments? If the compensation system is entered upon, it must ultimately place the National Guard upon the same footing with the Regular Army in respect to pay and allowances and exact of that organization the same service, discipline, and obedience, substantially, as is required of the standing Army. There will then be no State militia.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. GARRETT. Does not the gentleman believe that this legislation will be followed by the withdrawal by many of the States of the amount that they are now appropriating for the support of their militia?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That would be the natural result, because if the States can secure money to maintain their National Guard out of the Federal Treasury they will be glad to do so and save their own revenue. Then, having increased the pay to 50 per cent, the next move will be to give the National Guard the same pay and emoluments that are paid to soldiers of the Regular Army, enlisted men and officers. The effect of it will be to convert the State militia into a branch of the Regular Army, not only in its duties and obligations, but in its very character, and it will drive from the militia the class of young men—clerks, mechanics, and others—who have formed that organization in the past and who form it now. I want to emphasize that feature of the bill, and to warn Members of this House against the danger of this kind of legislation. It will convert the State militia into an organization of professional soldiers. We all know that in small communities, in the average country towns of 5,000 or 10,000 population, militia organizations are composed largely of young men whose lives are dedicated to pursuits of peace and not to warfare, and they will not submit themselves to the rigid discipline that will be required and that ought to be required by the Federal Government if large sums of money shall be taken out of the Federal Treasury for the purpose of building up the National Guard and converting it into a real fighting machine.

The average young American who has his mind upon a business career will not voluntarily bow his neck to a rigid yoke of military discipline. He may join an organization of militia, and submit to occasional drills in the manual of arms and general maneuvers, but his thought and energy in the main must be in his business. That is the chief objection I have to this bill. I think highly of the State Militia. A number of years ago I had the honor of being a second lieutenant [applause] in a company of militia organized to conduct military and social operations in the beautiful city of Valparaiso, in the State of Indiana. The social side of that organization was one of its chief attractions. You subject the class of young men that belonged to that company to the rigid military discipline that must necessarily follow this legislation—trial by court-martial, fines, and imprisonments—and 9 out of 10 of the self-respecting public-spirited young men who now compose the National Guard would never go into it. They would never submit to the rigid requirements of Regular Army discipline in times of peace. The National Guard now is inexpensive, and the training it receives is of great value in time of conflict. Change its character and you will drive out of it the bulk of the intelligent and patriotic young men who now compose it, young men who, with the training they are now receiving, will make the very best soldiers in actual war.

I protest against it. The proposition to pay officers and soldiers in the National Guard a fixed and regular compensation out of the Federal Treasury naturally appeals to them, but how many of them know of the conditions that are attached to the compensatory provision? How many of them know anything about the requirements contained in section 5 of the bill? If this bill becomes a law, there will be an annual charge of $10,000,000 upon the Federal Treasury on account of the State Militia, and the Government has the right to impose reciprocal conditions and obligations in consideration of this large yearly expenditure. In my judgment, the Government will be better off and the militia will be more efficient if this bill is not passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MANN). Debate on this paragraph is exhausted. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, to strike out section 1.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that motion.

Mr. HAY. I renew it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that section 1 carries the enacting clause.

Mr. HAY. I was aware of that fact, and I want to strike out the enacting clause.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia moves an amendment, to strike out the enacting clause, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the enacting clause.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Virginia to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAY) there were 87 ayes and 96 noes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 116, nays 151, answered "present" 10, not voting 107, as follows:

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I submit the report of the special committee appointed under House resolution 847, to investigate the circumstances connected with certain contracts said to exist between J. F. Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have my minority report also printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the printing of the two reports in the RECORD, as requested by the gentleman from South Dakota and the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The reports are as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

The committee appointed pursuant to and by virtue of the following House resolution, No. 847—

"Resolved, That a committee consisting of five members, each of whom shall be a Member of the House of Representatives, be appointed by the Speaker to investigate all circumstances connected with certain contracts now said to exist by and between J. F. McMurray, an attorney, of McAlester, Okla., or any other person or persons, and the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes of Indians of Oklahoma, or any member or members thereof, or any other of the Five Civilized Tribes, the Osage Indians, or any members thereof, this to include bribery, fraud, or any undue influence that may have been exerted on behalf of the approval or procuring of the said contracts, or any of them.

"Said committee is hereby empowered to sit and act at any place, to require the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers by subpœna to be signed by the chairman of said committee. The chairman of said committee, or any member thereof, is hereby empowered to administer oath. Said committee is further hereby empowered to take testimony under oath and in writing, to obtain documents, papers, and other information from the several departments of the Government or any bureau thereof, to employ not to exceed two stenographers to take and make a record of all evidence received by the committee and to keep a record of its proceedings. All costs and expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

"All hearings by said committee shall be open to the public. The committee shall report to this Congress all evidence taken and their findings and conclusions thereon. And in case of disobedience to a subpœna this committee may invoke the aid of any court of the United States or of any Territories or Districts thereof, within the jurisdiction of which any inquiry may be carried on by said committee in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this resolution, and any such court within the jurisdiction of which the inquiry under this resolution is being carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any person under authority of this resolution, issue an order requiring such persons to appear before the said committee and produce books and papers, if so ordered, and give evidence touching the matter in question, and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding except in prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony.

"And said committee may file its report with the Clerk of the House during the recess of Congress"— submits the following report:

The investigation authorized was the result of charges made in the Senate by Senator THOMAS P. GORE, of Oklahoma, June 24, 1910. Speaking of what was known as the "McMurray contracts," Senator GORE said:

"I shall not say what I intended to say when I rose, but I know that improper methods have been attempted in connection with these McMurray contracts. I speak from my own knowledge. A Member of this Senate was approached with an offer to be interested in those contracts, and a Member of the other House was approached on yesterday by a representative of Mr. McMurray with a similar overture.

"Mr. President, I may be green, and that may explain the presumption which some people have indulged in in connection with this matter, but I can not afford to let a false sense of modesty stand between me and my duty. The whole effort and combination to secure an approval of these contracts is conceived in corruption and has been brought forth in corruption."

He further said:

"On the 6th day of May a representative of Mr. McMurray, a man who resides in my State, a man toward whom I have sustained friendly relations, a man who has rendered me substantial assistance in the past, sir, I may say, came to my office and assured me that it might be made to my interest if I would call on the junior Senator from Colorado and advise him not to report the bill. The bill had already been reported at my urgent instance.

"Now, sir, I repeat that I dislike the humiliation which comes from the fact that anyone should have presumed to approach me on this subject. I suppose it was due to the intimacy of the friendship that had previously existed. There was some suggestion that some twenty-five or fifty thousand dollars might be available if the contracts were not further opposed by me. Unwilling to harbor such a secret, I told the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that day what had transpired. I told the Congressman from my State who represents the Indians involved. I also told other friends. My colleague was absent from the city.

"On yesterday, as I am advised, a representative of Mr. McMurray made a similar proposition to a Member in the other House.

"Now, an ex-Senator from Nebraska is interested in these contracts, and an ex-Senator from Kansas is interested in these contracts. A powerful lobby has been maintained here in the interest of these contracts, and I have expended every effort to secure legislation that would make their consummation an impossibility."

Immediately following the appointment of the committee the work of the investigation began by calling upon the Interior Department and the Department of Justice for copies of all contracts comprehended within the scope of the resolution, together with copies of all letters, papers, and other documents material to the subject matter within the scope of the inquiry authorized.

All of the members of the committee assembled at Muskogee, Okla., August 4, 1910, and proceeded on that date to hold the initial hearing. Hearings continued at various places in Oklahoma, to wit: Muskogee, McAlester, Sulphur, Pawhuska, and Tulsa up to and including the 27th day of August, when adjournment was taken to Washington, D. C., at a date in November to be fixed by the chairman. On the 23d day of November hearings were resumed in Washington and continued at intervals up to and including January 10, 1911. Arguments of attorneys were completed January 13, 1911. One hundred and sixteen witnesses were examined and all testimony was given under oath except as otherwise indicated. Numerous contracts, documents, and other papers were examined and some of them form the appendix which appears at pages 1143–1343 of this report.

John F. McMurray, the alleged principal whose agent Jake L. Hamon is alleged to have been, was represented during the entire investigation by counsel, consisting of Messrs. Flynn & Ames, of Oklahoma City, Okla., and Cecil H. Smith, of Sherman, Tex. Senator GORE was present or represented at most of the hearings and was given equal privileges with members of the committee in the matter of examining and cross-examining witnesses, and every person whom he requested to have called as a witness was subpœnaed, and special effort was made to secure all possible evidence touching any interest in the McMurray contracts that may have existed on the part of any Member of either branch of Congress.

At the conclusion of the hearings arguments continuing through two days were made by counsel for McMurray and by Senator GORE.

All of the evidence has been printed and is herewith submitted, together with the appendix containing the exhibits before referred to.

The resolution directs the committee to investigate—

"all circumstances connected with certain contracts now said to exist by and between J. F. McMurray, an attorney of McAlester, Okla., or any other person or persons, and the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes of Indians of Oklahoma, or any member or members thereof, or any other of the Five Civilized Tribes, the Osage Indians, or any members thereof, this to include bribery, fraud, or any undue influence that may have been exerted on behalf of the approval or procuring of the said contracts, or any of them."

Strictly construed the text of the resolution would have limited the committee to the investigation of existing contracts. But when the resolution was being considered in the House it was evidently contemplated that the committee was not to be so limited in its inquiry, but might inquire into any contracts. See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 25, 1910, wherein the following colloquy, which occurred on the floor of the House immediately prior to the adoption of the resolution, is reported:

"Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not this resolution is broad enough to include all contracts between this man McMurray and these nations of Indians?

"Mr. TAWNEY. And any other contracts?

"Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will it go back 10 years?

"Mr. MANN. It will go back as long as the committee wants it to go back."

It was deemed necessary, therefore, in order to make an exhaustive and intelligent inquiry relative to existing contracts with McMurray, to ascertain his contractual relations with any of the Five Civilized Tribes prior to entering into the pending or existing contracts.

GENERAL REVIEW OF M'MURRAY'S CONTRACTS.

It appears from the evidence that James F. McMurray is a lawyer, having been admitted to the bar at Gainesville, Tex., in 1890, where he resided until he removed to McAlester, Okla., then Indian Territory, in 1897, where he engaged in the practice of law. In 1898 he formed a partnership with George A. Mansfield and Melven Cornish, under the firm name of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish. In July, 1899, this firm was employed by the Chickasaw Nation to represent the tribe before the Dawes Commission in relation to citizenship matters. A contract was entered into between Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish and the Chickasaw Nation by which the said firm were to receive $5,000 annually for their services. In the early part of the year 1900 a similar contract was made with the Choctaw Nation at a salary of $5,000 per year to represent that nation before the Dawes Commission.

Both of these contracts appear to have been executed in accordance with the law and were approved by the department January 10, 1900.

The employment continued until March 4, 1907. It also appears that in 1900 contracts between Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish and the Chickasaw and Choctaw tribes were entered into by which the firm were to act as general counsel to the nations at an agreed salary of $5,000 per annum, to be paid by each nation; that they continued to serve under said contracts until March 4, 1907; that under the contract to represent the Chickasaw Nation as general counsel the firm were to receive the sum of $2,700 for expenses, and that said amount was paid to the said firm annually either directly or for expenses during their employment.

Enormous expenses were incurred by these attorneys, to pay which the $2,700 authorization was grossly inadequate. To meet the situation both nations passed numerous acts allowing expenses. On October 26, 1900, the Chickasaws passed a "blanket" expense act, authorizing expenses without limit. A fund of $30,000 had already been placed at the disposal of the governor, and he had most of it on hand when this firm began the work. The Choctaws also passed their share of these expense acts, one of which was in blanket form.

The law governing Indian contracts requires that they shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior and also that acts of the tribal councils authorizing contracts or the appropriation of money shall also be approved by the President, but it appears that neither of the contracts as general counsel or any of the acts of the tribal council making appropriations for expenses were submitted for approval, and, in fact, they were not approved; and large sums of money were paid to the said firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish for alleged expenses and upon vouchers that were not properly itemized; there is no way of determining as to how much of the money paid for alleged expenses were disbursed; but under the contracts referred to and the amounts appropriated and paid for expenses the said firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, between the dates named, received over $200,000. During this same period they were employed by these Indian tribes in other matters, and received therefor remuneration in large amounts. The contracts for service enjoyed by this firm with these two tribes, together with fees received or to be received up to March 4, 1907, as follows:

Citizenship, annual salary (aggregate)	$70,000
Citizenship court, contingent fee	750,000
General attorneys, annual salary (aggregate)	45,000
Due and unpaid	20,000
Incompetent fund	3,000
Due and unpaid	12,000
Freedman case, yet unpaid	27,500
Mississippi Choctaw case
J. Hale Sypher case
Eli Ayers case
Collection of tribal taxes
Total	927,500

In addition to above, J. F. McMurray has thus far received on his individual tax contracts the sum of $20,200, and about $55,000 remains unpaid.

During the time that this firm was employed, as has been stated, receiving annually a compensation of $20,000, in addition to the liberal amounts that were paid to them for expenses, besides having other compensation for special services, it developed that owing to some errors in the so-called Atoka agreement made by the Government with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations in 1898, and in order to more fully and properly administer the affairs of the two nations, it was thought advisable that there should be a supplemental agreement or new treaty made with the two nations. Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish were necessarily consulted, and aided in preparing a treaty which was subsequently entered into and approved. The work of negotiating this agreement began in 1901. (See testimony, pp. 672, 673.)

The service rendered in connection therewith by Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish was required under their contract of general employment. While employed and paid as stated, they obtained information as to enrollment upon which later was based the tribal contention that many persons had been wrongfully and illegally enrolled notwithstanding the fact that the proceedings which led to their enrollment were conducted in accordance with due process of law and the final order of their enrollment was decreed by a United States court. They thereupon entered into a contract with the two nations by which they were to receive 9 per cent of $4,800 for each person enrolled whose name they could eliminate from the rolls. (See testimony, p. 674.) There was no way by which persons so enrolled—locally known as court citizens—could be eliminated lawfully from participation in the tribal estate. The treaty negotiated in 1901, before referred to, and approved July 1, 1902, originally contained no provision authorizing the elimination of the so-called court citizens.

After the agreement had been duly signed by the representatives of the two nations and by the representatives of the Government, and after it was transmitted to Congress for ratification and approval, sections 31, 32, and 33 were inserted at the request of McMurray, which sections are predicated on the assumption that the United States courts in the Indian Territory, acting under the act of June 10, 1896, had admitted persons to citizenship in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations without notice to both of said nations. It was contended by the nations that in such proceedings notice to each of said nations was indispensable, and they claimed and insisted that the proceedings in the United States courts in the Indian Territory under the act of June 10, 1896, should have been confined to a review of the action of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes upon the record in each case, and should not have extended to a trial de novo of the question of citizenship.

These sections authorized the two nations, jointly, or either of said nations acting separately and making the other a party defendant, by a bill in equity filed in the citizenship court, to bring a suit for the purpose of testing the validity of all such decisions of the United States courts. It further provided that 10 persons admitted to citizenship or enrollment by the United States courts with notice to but one of said nations, should be made defendants to a suit as representatives of the entire class of persons similarly situated. In other words, it authorized the bringing of a test suit and provided that in the event said citizenship judgments or decisions were annulled or vacated any party thereto within 90 days thereafter by a written application might have his case transferred to the citizenship court by the court where the judgment was entered and that the citizenship court should have jurisdiction therein as if no judgment or decision had been rendered by the United States court. It was provided that the judgment of this citizenship court should be final.

The act provided that it should not be effective until submitted to and ratified by a vote of the two nations, but exception was made as to sections 31, 32, and 33, creating the citizenship court, which became effective upon the passage and approval of the act. (See testimony, p. 675.)

Immediately following the passage of the act ratifying the agreement of 1902 the judges authorized to be appointed to constitute the citizenship court were appointed as follows: Spencer Adams, of North Carolina; Henry S. Foote, of California; and Walter L. Weaver, of Ohio. Judge Foote appears to have been appointed upon the recommendation of Senator Stewart, who was then chairman of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, and Judge Adams on the recommendation of Senator Pritchard, of North Carolina. Judge Foote was the brother-in-law of Senator Stewart. (See testimony, p. 675.) The law creating this court is without legislative parallel; the manner of its enactment was extraordinary, and the authority which it conferred upon the court it created is without precedent in American jurisprudence.

As soon as this court was created and organized, the firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish proceeded to bring before it a very large number of claims of "court citizens," and they succeeded in eliminating from the rolls between 3,500 and 4,000 persons. (See testimony, p. 676.) They then claimed a fee of 9 per cent on a basis of $4,800 per person as provided in the contingent-fee contract made in 1901, before referred to, which had not been approved in accordance with the law. After much controversy between Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish and the department, the Secretary of the Interior finally offered to approve their contract in the sum of $250,000. This they refused to accept, and succeeded in having incorporated in an Indian appropriation bill a provision authorizing the so-called "citizenship court" to determine the amount of their compensation. Under the authority conferred by this act the court fixed the amount of the fee at $750,000, and very soon thereafter the court dissolved and ceased to have existence. In addition to this enormous fee, the contract provided that the attorneys should be paid their expenses and they now have a claim against the nations for $25,500 for unpaid expenses. (See testimony, p. 673.)

After protracted litigation in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish succeeded in obtaining from the Secretary of the Treasury a warrant drawn upon the Treasurer of the United States in the sum of $750,000 payable to their order. (For the division and disposition of this sum of money, see testimony at p. 1054 et seq.)

During all of the time that Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish represented the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, it appears that they were able to direct the affairs of both tribes, particularly the Chickasaws, to a greater or less extent, and were able apparently to secure the enactment of such tribal acts authorizing their employment, or providing appropriations to pay their expenses, as they seemed to think their interests demanded. The governor of the Chickasaw Nation at all times appears to have followed the suggestions of this firm and was apparently ready and willing always to promote their interests. In return the firm contributed toward the election expenses of the Choctaw governor, and provided a special train to take voters to the polls in the interest of the Chickasaw governor. (See testimony, p. 795.)

Mr. Mansfield appears to have been the lawyer of the firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish. Mr. Cornish was taken into the firm probably because of his employment for some years with the Dawes Commission and his general knowledge of tribal affairs, particularly in respect to the rolls of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations. (See testimony, p. 667.) Mr. McMurray was the active member of the firm who attended to political matters, obtaining contracts, securing legislation, and he might be termed the promoter of the firm. It may be said that each member was diligent in performing his part of what the firm undertook to accomplish. Following the payment of the $750,000 fee, before referred to, and in the month of June, 1905, Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish were indicted in the United States court charged with the unlawful expenditure and appropriation of the funds of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, it being alleged that much of the money paid to them for expenses, though it was authorized by the tribal councils, was in fact unlawful, because the tribal acts making appropriations had not been approved by the President of the United States. About this time an act was passed by the Chickasaw Nation authorizing a contract to be made with counsel in connection with the sale of what is known as the segregated land belonging to the Chickasaw and Choctaw Nations, this being the coal and asphalt land. (See Exhibit 11, p. 1158.) A similar act was enacted in 1905 by the Choctaw Nation. (See Exhibit 12, p. 1159.)

In November, 1905, the Chickasaw Nation entered into a contract with Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish and Cecil A. Lyon by which they were to receive 10 per cent from the proceeds from the sale of the segregated land. (See copy of contract in Appendix, p. 1161.) A similar contract was also entered into with the Choctaw Nation in November, 1905. (See copy of contract in Appendix, p. 1162.)

Mr. Lyon is not a lawyer, was not a resident of Oklahoma or associated with Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, but was a prominent citizen and business man of the State of Texas, and held the position of chairman of the State committee and member of the national committee of the Republican Party for the State of Texas.

It was also well known that he was a personal friend of the then President of the United States. That this was a prominent factor in inducing Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish to give him an interest in the contracts with the two nations is apparent and is admitted by McMurray. (See testimony, p. 716.) It was probably thought that he could be of material service in securing the approval by the President of the tribal contracts referred to, and also that he might contribute toward getting the indictments against the firm dismissed. In July, 1905, Mr. Lyon wrote a letter to the President requesting that the indictments against Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish be investigated, and an investigation was directed by the President. Charles W. Russell, of the Department of Justice, was delegated to direct the investigation, and there were numerous conferences with him and Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish at which Mr. Lyon was present.

On December 8, 1905, Mr. Lyon sent a telegram to the President as follows:

"In spite report Attorney General cases against Johnston, McMurray et al. not dismissed, Ardmore, Ind. T. Please so direct." (See testimony, p. 405.)

The United States attorney for the district in Indian Territory was promptly removed by the President, but on the same day was reinstated. He had been opposing vigorously the dismissal of the indictments and had reported against a dismissal of them to the Department of Justice. The matter was subsequently further investigated and finally was referred to Hon. Charles Nagel, of St. Louis, who investigated and reported that in his judgment the moneys expended having been appropriated by authority of the tribal councils, a conviction for having misappropriated funds could not be maintained, and following that report the indictments were finally dismissed.

The tribal contracts for the sale of the segregated land, to which reference has been made, were not transmitted to the President through the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes and the department, as is the custom, but were carried to Washington by Cecil A. Lyon in person and presented to the President for his approval. The President consulted the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and declined to approve the contracts, doing so verbally. No indorsement was made upon them and they were returned to Mr. Lyon. (See testimony, pp. 400, 401.) Copies of the tribal acts authorizing these contracts to be made were discovered by the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes some time in 1908 and transmitted to the President and by him disapproved. Notwithstanding the fact that President Roosevelt refused to approve these tribal contracts and the tribal acts authorizing them had been by him disapproved in 1908, we find in March, 1910, the contracts presented to President Taft and his approval requested, and without regard to the fact that individual contracts had been entered into by a large number of the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations.

By these individual contracts the Indians agreed to pay him 10 per cent of whatever money might ultimately be received from the proceeds not only of the segregated land, but of the surplus land, and of any other property belonging to the two tribes, including undoubtedly the money already to their credit in the Treasury.

By the terms of the agreements with the Five Civilized Tribes lands allotted to the members thereof were to be exempt from taxation for a period of 21 years. In 1908 Congress passed an act which had the effect of removing the restriction from a very large number of the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes. As soon as the restrictions were removed the State of Oklahoma proceeded to assess the lands affected for purposes of taxation. There was much feeling on account of this action and a determined disposition was manifested on the part of the Indians to resist the taxation of their lands.

The subject aroused much contention, and Gov. Johnston, of the Chickasaw Nation, called a mass meeting of Choctaws and Chickasaws at Tishomingo in July, 1908. At this meeting a committee of three or five was named to take into consideration public matters affecting the tribes and make a report to an adjourned meeting of the Indians to be held at Sulphur in August. At the Sulphur meeting the committee was enlarged to 15 and their authority extended to advertise for and employ an attorney. A subsequent meeting was also held at Ardmore. The committee of 15 finally met at Tishomingo in the fall of 1908 and selected J. F. McMurray to act as their attorney. At this meeting an association was formed, known as the Treaty Rights Association, whose object should be to resist the collection of taxes and the securing of an early settlement of all tribal affairs. The invitation for proposals for doing this work brought responses from several firms. These proposals were on a cash basis for the most part. (See record, pp. 502 to 507.) McMurray submitted a proposition that he would undertake the work on a basis of $10 per allotment, the same to be paid in cash by the allottees, offering, however, to take a note in the place of cash. Coupled with this was the requirement that there would be circulated with each of these tax contracts an individual contract employing Mr. McMurray as attorney to handle all the undivided property of the tribe in which the individuals were interested and giving to Mr. McMurray as a fee 10 per cent of any sum or property that might come to the individual from the wealth of the nation.

The committee accepted McMurray's proposition, and members of the committee were thereupon employed by Mr. McMurray as his agents to solicit these contracts. The committee is of the opinion that while proposals from other attorneys were invited, in reality the committee was strongly biased and prejudiced in favor of McMurray. Undoubtedly McMurray, and certain members of the tribes working in his interest, had much to do with the naming of the committee of 15; otherwise that committee would not have consisted of so many strong McMurray admirers, and have been dominated by a few of McMurray's stanch supporters. Members of this committee of 15 and others soliciting these contracts received nothing for the individual property contracts but 10 per cent of the amount stipulated in the tax contracts, which would be $1 for each.

The individual contracts authorized McMurray to draw his compensation, namely, 10 per cent, out of the Treasury of the United States upon the adjustment of any claims of the Choctaws and Chickasaws when the proceeds should be placed in the Treasury to the credit of the tribes, or as money should be realized from the sale of the tribal property. The contracts are signed only by the allottees and not by McMurray, and under the terms thereof he would receive 10 per cent, as above stated, of the amount placed in the Treasury to the credit of the two nations without performing any substantial service, which would amount in the aggregate to a fabulous sum—probably $2,000,000 or more.

The law with reference to Indian contracts makes no reference to individual contracts, and evidently Congress did not contemplate that individual Indians could make contracts affecting their interest in tribal property under any circumstances. McMurray apparently assumed the approval of the President to his individual contracts would at least give them official recognition, so that if legislation should be necessary to make them legal it would be easy to secure. Or he thought the approval might be sufficient to cause the contracts to be recognized by the Treasury Department in withholding and paying to him 10 per cent of such moneys as might be paid into the Treasury from the proceeds of the sale of surplus and segregated lands, which proceeds were to be distributed among the individual members of the two tribes.

The committee is of the opinion that neither these individual contracts nor the tribal contracts should be approved, and that legislation should be enacted, if not declaring them void, providing that the moneys belonging to the tribes when distributed should not be subject to the lien of any debt, obligation, or liability contracted prior to the final distribution of the tribal funds.

It was about this time that the services of two former Senators were secured by McMurray and an active campaign was instituted to secure the approval or recognition of the contracts. Cecil A. Lyon testified that upon President Roosevelt's disapproval of the tribal acts authorizing the contracts in which he was interested he gave the matter no further attention, yet it appears from the testimony that having called at the Department of Justice on April 27, 1910, on a mission unconnected with these contracts, he remained to attend a conference held in the office of the Attorney General on that date, at which hearing ex-Senators Thurston and Long and McMurray were present, and the subject of which hearing was the approval or recognition of these contracts. (See record, p. 407, Exhibit 22, p. 1177.)

One circumstance relating to McMurray's effort to secure presidential approval of his individual contracts is of special interest, as it demonstrates his shrewd methods in accomplishing what he undertakes and is in accord with his general method of operating in securing contracts with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations. During the second session of the Sixty-first Congress the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives held numerous hearings on bills proposing to reopen the rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes for the purpose of enrolling applicants who claimed to have been denied their rights to enrollment. Naturally those who have been enrolled are opposed to the enrollment of additional persons, and it is an easy matter by a little agitation to arouse opposition to such legislation. Opportunely one Richard C. Adams, a mixed-blood Indian, posing as an Indian historian and representing himself as the friend of Indians generally, projected himself into Choctaw-Chickasaw affairs. Adams is interested in Indian claims of more or less doubtful merit against the Government which he has worked up in his rôle of Indian historian (testimony, p. 915), amounting to more than $20,000,000 (testimony, pp. 918, 935).

In these claims he has a contingent interest of from 10 to 35 per cent. Simultaneously with the agitation among Choctaws and Chickasaws over the subject of adding new names to their rolls, Adams called upon the President in April, 1910, ostensibly for the purpose of protesting against the opening of the rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes, and by reason, in the opinion of this committee, of misleading representations, he induced the President to write a letter stating that he, the President, was opposed to the reopening of the rolls. The letter written was addressed to Adams, and as soon as it was in his possession he caused its publication to be made and it was widely circulated among the Five Civilized Tribes for selfish purposes. Whether he went to McMurray with a suggestion that he might render him valuable service in connection with the matter of securing the approval of his contracts, or whether McMurray conceived the idea that he could make use of Adams, is immaterial, but it does appear that about that time negotiations began between them resulting in a contract being entered into May 3, 1910, by which McMurray agreed to pay to the said Adams a fee equal to one-twentieth of the amount that McMurray might receive from his Choctaw-Chickasaw contracts, whether tribal or individual. (See Exhibit 23, p. 1189.) On the same day McMurray telegraphed his agent in Oklahoma directing him to solicit telegrams to be sent to Adams commending him for his success in getting a statement from the President, and incidentally mentioning approval of his (McMurray's) contracts. For a few days following that date Adams was deluged by such telegrams.

The committee summoned many persons who appeared to have sent such telegrams, and in every instance found that they were solicited by agents of McMurray, and in some instances telegrams were written and signed without the sender seeing or knowing just what the message contained. A large number were written in McMurray's office at McAlester. The following is a fair sample of the telegrams referred to:

"I thank you for services rendered in our matters. We earnestly urge that our rolls be not opened and that our attorney, McMurray, be permitted to represent us in final settlement all matters. No division among our people as to desirability of early settlement. They have confidence in McMurray, and his past services have resulted in great benefit. We urge his recognition and believe desired end can be attained only in that way.

"_____ _____.

"Hon. RICHARD C. ADAMS,
"Washington, D. C."

Adams filed these telegrams with the President as an evidence of the apparent feeling among the members of the Five Civilized Tribes relative to his position on the rolls question, and there was nothing to cause the President to know that Adams was actuated by ulterior motives and certainly nothing to indicate that he was representing McMurray or interested in the McMurray contracts. About the same time ex-Senator Thurston, counsel for McMurray, filed copies of the telegrams with the Attorney General with the following statement:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1910.

"In the matter of the McMurray contracts, Mr. R. C. Adams, of this city, has received some 200 or 300 telegrams and letters approving the letter of the President to Mr. Adams of recent date, the publication of which the President authorized. In these communications, sent in without solicitation from Mr. Adams or Mr. McMurray, almost all state their approval of and desire to have McMurray's contracts recognized or approved. These letters and telegrams will be submitted by Mr. Adams to the President to-day or to-morrow in his own matter, but I am having copies of them made to submit to you as having an important bearing in Mr. McMurray's case. They come from the very best men of the Choctaws and Chickasaws and prove how earnestly the great majority of these people desire Mr. McMurray's services under his contracts.

"J. M. THURSTON.

"The ATTORNEY GENERAL."

The purpose of submitting these telegrams to the Attorney General is manifest. It is, however, due to Mr. Thurston to state that he testified he had no knowledge of how the telegrams were obtained or that Adams had any interest in the McMurray contracts, and that he believed the telegrams were received unsolicited, as stated by him to the Attorney General.

Adams was incapable of rendering any service to McMurray in connection with his contracts other than to aid him in securing their approval, and the only assistance he could render in that respect was by allowing himself to be used to secure what might appear to be an expression of approval of the contracts from prominent members of the tribes, and for this service, assuming the contracts should be approved and that McMurray would receive $3,000,000, he, Adams, would receive $150,000. This is sufficient, in the opinion of the committee, to condemn the contracts.

QUESTIONS CONSIDERED—CONCLUSION REACHED.

In reaching its conclusions the committee considered the following questions in the light of the testimony which covered the scope of the charges made by Senator GORE.

(1) Was Senator GORE approached by Jake L. Hamon substantially as charged by Senator GORE on the floor of the Senate June 24 or did Hamon make any improper proposal to Senator GORE respecting the McMurray contracts on May 6 or on any date prior or subsequent thereto? If so, was Hamon, in whatever negotiations he may have sought with Senator GORE, acting by authority or with the consent or knowledge of McMurray?

(2) Was any Member of the House of Representatives approached by Hamon substantially as charged by Senator GORE in his statements on the floor of the Senate June 24, 1910? If so, was Hamon acting as agent of McMurray or with his consent or knowledge?

(3) Was any Member of the House of Representatives interested in the McMurray contracts?

(4) Was any Member of the Senate interested in the McMurray contracts?

(5) Was a former Senator from Nebraska interested in the McMurray contracts? If so, was he improperly interested and did he attempt improperly to influence any Senator or Representative in respect to the McMurray contracts?

(6) Was a former Senator from Kansas interested in the McMurray contracts? If so, was he improperly interested and did he attempt improperly to influence any Senator or Representative in respect to the McMurray contracts?

(7) Was a powerful lobby operating in Washington in the interest of Indian contracts during the second session of the Sixty-first Congress? If so, did such lobby resort to corrupt practices?

(8) Was bribery, fraud, or any undue influence exerted on behalf of the approval or procuring of contracts between J. F. McMurray or any other person or persons and the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians or any members thereof, or any other of the Five Civilized Tribes, the Osage Indians, or any members thereof?

The committee makes the following findings of fact relative to the charges made by Senator GORE:

(1) In the opinion of the committee Jake L. Hamon did on or about May 6, 1910, make an improper proposal to Senator GORE respecting the McMurray contracts substantially as charged, but there is no evidence that he was acting by authority or with the consent or knowledge of McMurray.

The evidence discloses the fact that subsequent to May 6 McMurray called upon Senator GORE at his office in the Senate Office Building and was cordially received by the Senator. There was no suggestion by word or act that Senator GORE looked upon McMurray as Hamon's principal in the matter of the corrupt overtures previously made by Hamon. On the contrary, the undisputed conduct of Senator GORE toward McMurray was such as to preclude the possibility of the belief that at that time Senator GORE considered McMurray as a party to the corrupt overtures made by Hamon.

It further appears from the testimony and the statement of Senator GORE when he made the charges in the Senate that he and Hamon are residents of Lawton, Okla., and have been friends for some considerable time; that they had some business relations of a friendly nature; that Hamon prior to May 6, 1910, called occasionally upon Senator GORE while in Washington, and in spite of what occurred on May 6 these relations continued. Subsequent to that date Hamon called upon Senator GORE, who responded to Hamon's request for aid in securing the confirmation of Hamon's father-in-law as postmaster on or about May 10; that on June 14, Hamon called upon the Senator at the Capitol to secure his assistance in passing a bill to which an amendment was to be offered in which Hamon had a substantial financial interest; they discussed the matter, and upon the conclusion of the conference Senator GORE called up a bill in the Senate to which the amendment referred to was offered by another Senator, and the bill was passed; in the evening of that day Hamon called of his own motion at Senator GORE's house, and during the visit expressed his appreciation of the assistance rendered by Senator GORE, and apparently there was nothing to indicate any unfriendliness on the part of Senator GORE toward Hamon. It further appears from the testimony that Senator GORE told one or more friends about May 6 of the offer made by Hamon.

The continuation of Senator GORE's apparently friendly attitude toward Hamon and McMurray may be explained by the statement of Senator GORE in his argument before the committee January 13, when, in response to questions propounded by Mr. STEPHENS, as to whether he had "any other object in bringing these charges except the defeat of the McMurray contracts," Senator GORE replied, "None on earth. That is the only purpose I have had in view."

(2) It is also the conclusion of the committee that Jake L. Hamon did approach a Member of the House of Representatives, Hon. CHARLES E. CREAGER, on or about the 16th day of June, 1910, and made an improper proposal respecting the said McMurray contracts, but there is no evidence to show that he was acting by authority of or with the consent or knowledge of McMurray. The testimony shows that the proposition was a suggestion rather than an offer, and was so promptly and emphatically resented by Mr. CREAGER that no definite proposal was made. No subsequent attempt was made to approach Mr. CREAGER on the subject.

(3) The committee finds that no Member of the House of Representatives has or had any interest of a pecuniary nature in any of the McMurray contracts.

No evidence exists to show that any Member of the House had any pecuniary interest in the contracts, and if there was anything to suggest an improper interest it was due to the friendly relations that appeared to exist between McMurray and Representative B. S. MCGUIRE, and the fact that Mr. MCGUIRE did aid McMurray in securing the approval of his contracts, by trying to secure the adoption of an amendment to an appropriation bill that would have materially increased a fee in which McMurray was interested and in offering to one of the conferees of the House on the deficiency appropriation bill a substitute for the so-called Gore amendment, which substitute might have been construed as an approval of the contracts by legislative act. There is no evidence to sustain any finding that Mr. MCGUIRE profited or expected to profit in any way for any assistance which he may have rendered McMurray.

(4) The committee finds that no Member of the Senate has or had any interest in any of the McMurray contracts. There is nothing whatever in the testimony to sustain such a suggestion. The committee exhausted all possible sources of information and no evidence supporting such a theory could be found. It appears to have been based upon the statement made by Jake L. Hamon to Senator GORE on May 6, 1910, when he approached him and used the names of Senator CHARLES CURTIS, of Kansas, and the Vice President, JAMES S. SHERMAN. It was in consequence of this effort and the statement of Senator GORE that the committee made and published the following finding at Sulphur, Okla., August 20, 1910:

"The committee have heard and carefully considered all of the testimony submitted and is unanimous in the opinion that there is and was no warrant for any person to use the names of Vice President JAMES S. SHERMAN and Senator CHARLES CURTIS in connection with any improper relation with any Indian contract whatever, and commend the statement of Senator GORE in this connection.

"CHAS. H. BURKE, Chairman.
"PHIL. P. CAMPBELL.
"C. B. MILLER.
"JNO. H. STEPHENS.
"E. W. SAUNDERS."

Senator GORE's statement was as follows:

"To the investigating committee appointed in pursuance of House resolution 847.

"MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMITTEE: I feel in duty and in honor bound to make the following statement. It is also dictated by considerations of common justice toward the parties concerned. Neither the name of Vice President SHERMAN nor Senator CURTIS was mentioned by me on the floor of the United States Senate. That the name of either of these parties was alluded to by Mr. Hamon was steadfastly withheld from the public until this investigation began. No public mention of their names was ever made, either directly or indirectly, by me until I was required and obliged to do so testifying as a witness under oath and detailing the conversation which occurred between Mr. Hamon and myself. I then made formal protest against introducing their names, but the committee in the proper pursuit of its duties required me to make a full answer without reservation. Their names were disclosed not with any view to inculpating them nor with any view of suggesting guilt, but merely in order that the truth and the whole truth might be related with reference to the details of the conversation in question. The public must realize that the name of any man could be used or misused in the same connection, either as an argument or otherwise, and no public official can have immunity and protection against such an injury and injustice.

"In my last remarks in the Senate I said that 'the integrity of no man can be impeached upon the testimony of an interested or untrustworthy witness.' That was my conviction then. That is my conviction now. I am sure that in the court of public opinion no judgment or verdict has been returned either against the Vice President or Senator CURTIS on account of the misuse of their names in the manner above referred to. The investigation is now practically concluded. Many witnesses have been examined, a volume of evidence has been adduced, and there is no testimony tending to establish any improper connection on the part of either official with the approval of the so-called McMurray contracts. While the public has had no reason to suspect any such improper connection, yet I would venture to suggest, and if I may be pardoned, would request that the committee at the earliest practicable moment make an authoritative finding and statement to the effect that no evidence has been presented tending to establish any improper conduct on the part of either Vice President SHERMAN or Senator CURTIS respecting the subject of this investigation.

"T. P. GORE."

(5) It is established by the evidence that a former Senator from Nebraska, Hon. John M. Thurston, was retained by McMurray as his legal adviser, and that the compensation for his services was upon a contingent basis, but that he had no other interest in the contracts, and his employment was legitimate. Neither is there any evidence that Mr. Thurston attempted improperly to influence any Senator or Representative in respect to the McMurray contracts.

(6) It is established by the evidence that a former Senator from Kansas, Hon. Chester I. Long, subsequent to his retirement from the Senate, was retained by McMurray to assist him in connection with his contracts and to secure the approval thereof and that he was to receive for his services, in addition to his expenses, one-tenth of whatever amount McMurray might ultimately receive from his contracts, and to that extent he was interested therein. His employment, however, was lawful, and there is no evidence that he attempted improperly to influence any Senator or Representative in respect to the said contracts.

With reference to the findings in relation to the employment of ex-Senator Thurston and ex-Senator Long, the committee is of the opinion that while they were lawfully employed to represent Mr. McMurray in the matter of his contracts, McMurray undoubtedly was actuated in engaging their services by the fact that they had served in the Senate and therefore occupied an advantageous position in the matter of assisting him to secure the approval of his contracts or procuring such legislation as might be necessary to insure their approval.

(7) There was a lobby operating in Washington in the interest of the McMurray contracts during the second session of the Sixty-first Congress. No evidence, however, was offered and none could be found to sustain a charge that such lobby resorted to corrupt practices in the interest of such contracts, with the exception of Jake L. Hamon, or that improper overtures were made to any Member of Congress except as herein stated.

(8) Evidence to sustain the charge that bribery, fraud, or undue influence was exerted on behalf of the approval or the procuring of contracts between J. F. McMurray or any other person or persons and the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians or any members thereof, or any of the Five Civilized Tribes, the Osage Indians or any members thereof, is limited to the overtures alleged to have been made by McMurray to D. C. McCurtain. The committee believes McMurray sought to obtain the unwavering influence of Principal Chief Green McCurtain, of the Choctaw tribe, and also of his son, Delegate D. C. McCurtain, in support of his contracts, by the transfer of a contingent interest in the contracts to the maximum limit of $25,000 to D. C. McCurtain. It is not probable that such overtures come within the statutory definition of bribery or fraud, but your committee believes that the method employed by McMurray to interest the Choctaw chief and his son is reprehensible and should be characterized by a stronger term than "undue influence." The committee further believes that the mental condition existing among members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes in respect to the good faith of the United States Government in dealing with them has been largely brought about through an effort by McMurray and members of the tribes financially interested or sympathetically cooperating with him to create a sentiment which was designed to aid McMurray in obtaining lucrative contracts with the Indians which otherwise would have been impossible.

INDIAN CLAIMS—CONTINGENT FEES.

The committee made inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining to what extent appropriations have been made by Congress in recent years for the payment of Indian claims, together with the amount of attorney's fees paid. (See testimony, pp. 605–607.) The fees referred to in the testimony amount to nearly $4,000,000, and some of them were exorbitant, unconscionable, and in contravention of public policy, notwithstanding the fact that they had the direct or indirect approval of Congress.

Many Indian claims, antiquated and without meritorious basis, have been trumped up against the Government by industrious attorneys, claim agents, and professional lobbyists, until there is now pending, in one form or another, in the departments and before Congress, claims of this character amounting to many millions of dollars.

In the present Congress scores of bills have been introduced on the subject of these antiquated claims for no other purpose than to provide a dragnet for obtaining information from the departments with the object of bolstering up these questionable claims, and if an adverse report on one of these bills is authorized by the Committee on Indian Affairs, forces are immediately put in motion in behalf of the same purpose and another bill of the same import is likely to be introduced in the name of some accommodating Member of Congress, who gives the matter slight consideration, depending upon the Committee on Indian Affairs to sift the facts and dispose of the bill. The practice of lobbyists has become so bold that it has happened since this report has been in process of formulation for submission to this House, an adversely reported bill has been succeeded on the committee's calendar by another of similar import without even the knowledge of the Representative in whose name it was introduced. In case of adjournment of Congress without any action by the committee, other bills make their appearance in the succeeding Congress, and so the procedure continues indefinitely in the hope that ultimately a committee and a Congress may be found that will provide the appropriation with the contingent fee attachment.

Of course the purpose of those actively engaged in exploiting such claims is to obtain the fee contracted for upon a contingent basis. The effect of such compensation for adventurers who, quoting the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, "make market of themselves in this way," should receive the careful consideration of Congress. The committee is of the opinion that the court could not have expressed itself more pertinently to many contracts which have been the subject of investigation by this committee within the past eight months than it did in the case of Marshall v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. (57 U. S., 314, 335), when it said:

"Bribes, in the shape of high contingent compensation, must necessarily lead to the use of improper means and the exercise of undue influence. Their necessary consequence is the demoralization of the agent who covenants for them; he is soon brought to believe that any means which will produce so beneficial a result to himself are 'proper means'; and that a share of these profits may have the same effect of quickening the perceptions and warming the zeal of influential or 'careless' Members in favor of his bill."

Again, in the case of Trist v. Child (21 U. S., 441, 451) the court expressed itself as follows:

"The agreement in the present case was for the sale of the influence and exertions of the lobby agent to bring about the passage of a law for the payment of a private claim, without reference to its merits, by means which, if not corrupt, were illegitimate, and, considered in connection with the pecuniary interest of the agent at stake, contrary to the plainest principles of public policy. No one has a right, in such circumstances, to put himself in a position of temptation to do what is regarded as so pernicious in its character. The law forbids the inchoate step, and puts the seal of its reprobation upon the undertaking."

In the same case the court continued by making the following observations:

"If any of the great corporations of the country were to hire adventurers who make market of themselves in this way to procure the passage of a general law with a view to the promotion of their private interests, the moral sense of every right-minded man would instinctively denounce the employer and employed as steeped in corruption, and the employment as infamous. * * *

"The prohibition of the law rests upon a solid foundation. A private bill is apt to attract little attention. It involves no great public interest, and usually fails to excite much discussion. Not infrequently the facts are whispered to those whose duty it is to investigate, vouched for by them, and the passage of the measure is thus secured. If the agent is truthful, and conceals nothing, all is well. If he uses nefarious means with success, the springhead and the stream of legislation are polluted. To legalize the traffic of such service would open a door at which fraud and falsehood would not fail to enter and make themselves felt at every accessible point. It would invite their presence and offer them a premium. If the tempted agent be corrupt himself, and disposed to corrupt others, the transition requires but a single step. He has the means in his hands, with every facility and a strong incentive to use them. The widespread suspicion which prevails, and charges openly made and hardly denied, lead to the conclusion that such events are not of rare occurrence. Where the avarice of the agent is inflamed by the hope of a reward contingent upon success, and to be graduated by a percentage upon the amount appropriated, the danger of tampering in its worst form is greatly increased."

The case of Adams, with contracts for claims representing more than $20,000,000, in which he has a contingent interest ranging from 10 to 35 per cent, presents a good example of the necessity and advisability of enacting legislation limiting the fees that shall be paid in any case, and the committee recommends that the subject have careful consideration by Congress and that legislation be enacted with this purpose in view.

Furthermore, the committee is of the opinion that the appearance of former Senators and former Members of the House of Representatives in respect to matters where legislation is desired to be procured through their activities, as well as in matters requiring executive or departmental approval, should be discouraged.

OTHER INDIAN CONTRACTS.

The House resolution also directed the investigation of all existing contracts between any person or persons other than J. F. McMurray who have contracts with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, or any member or members thereof, or any other of the Five Civilized Tribes, the Osage Indians, or any members thereof. The committee therefore endeavored to ascertain, and believes it has ascertained, all existing contracts contemplated by the resolution.

The Choctaw Nation has a contract with the firm of McCurtain & Hill, attorneys at law, McAlester, Okla., by which said attorneys are to advise the principal chief upon all legal matters and questions arising and touching the affairs of the Choctaw Nation, and to represent said nation before the Interior Department, the committees of Congress, and in the courts of the United States in the Indian Territory, the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Court of Claims. In other words, to represent them in all matters requiring legal services. The contract provides for a compensation of $8,000 per annum, payable monthly, in addition to actual personal and traveling expenses of the attorneys when away from the place of their residence, and the salary and expenses of a clerk not to exceed $75 per month. (See Appendix, Exhibit 58, p. 1258.)

The Chickasaw Nation has a contract with Messrs. Rodgers & Clapp, attorneys at law, Muskogee, Okla., similar to the contract of McCurtain & Hill with the Choctaw Nation, the compensation being $6,000 per annum, payable in monthly installments, and all reasonable and proper expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties. (See Appendix, Exhibit 48, p. 1344.)

The Cherokee Nation has a contract with William W. Hastings, attorney at law, of Tahlequah, Okla., substantially the same as the two contracts before referred to, which contract provides for an annual compensation of $5,000, payable monthly, and expenses when outside of the State of Oklahoma. (See Appendix, Exhibit 71, p. 1282.)

The Creek Nation has a contract with M. L. Mott, an attorney at law, residing at Muskogee, Okla. The terms thereof are similar to the other contracts referred to and the compensation is $5,000 per annum. (See Appendix, Exhibit 76, p. 1293.)

The Creek Nation has a contract with M. L. Sturdevant, of St. Louis, Mo., to represent the nation in the courts of Oklahoma in matters affecting the right of heirship on the part of full-bloods, the case being known as the Marchie Tiger case, the compensation being fixed and limited to $5,000. This contract was approved by President Roosevelt in accordance with the law. (See Appendix, Exhibit 78, p. 1296.)

The Creek Nation also has a contract with W. L. Sturdevant, of St. Louis, Mo., to represent the nation in the matter of resisting the collection of taxes upon the homestead of any citizen of the Creek Nation, the compensation being fixed and limited to $15,000, out of which all expenses are to be paid; $3,000 of the amount to be paid to Mr. Grant Forman, of Muskogee, and J. Cudy Johnson, a Creek citizen, of Wewoka, Okla., attorneys at law, employed to assist the said Sturdevant. (See Appendix, Exhibit 78 A, p. 1297.)

The Osage Tribe has a contract with Messrs. Kappler & Merillat, attorneys at law, Washington, D. C. This contract contemplates that they are to represent said nation before the executive departments and the committees of Congress and the courts of the United States in all proceedings relating to the tribal rolls, lands, or funds in which said nation may be interested. The compensation is $5,000 per annum and necessary traveling expenses or costs incurred in the courts or in the executive or other departments of the Government in the prosecution of matters in which said nation is interested. (See Appendix, p. 1299.)

The seven contracts last referred to were all duly approved by the President or Secretary of the Interior as provided by law.

The tribes mentioned in the contracts referred to have large and valuable properties, and there are many questions constantly arising relative to their affairs which require the services of attorneys, and in the opinion of the committee, notwithstanding the obligation of the Government to administer their affairs and finally dispose of and distribute their estates, they should be permitted to have the aid of counsel of their own selection. The contracts specifically mentioned are all with reputable attorneys and at a reasonable compensation.

The Creek Nation also has a contract with Messrs. Butler & Vale and Kappler & Merillat, attorneys at law, Washington, D. C., by which said attorneys agree to represent said nation in the matter of a claim of the Creek Nation to compensation from the United States in which the Indians contend that the Government owes them a sum sufficient to equalize the allotments of the members thereof in accordance with their interpretation of the terms of an agreement between the Government and said nation. This contract is contingent and the attorneys are to receive 10 per cent of whatever amount may be recovered.

This contract does not appear to have been approved in accordance with the law. (See Appendix, Exhibit 79, p. 1298.) If the contention of the nation should prevail it would recover nearly $4,000,000. Under the terms of the contract the attorneys would receive a compensation greater than the services rendered would justify, and if legislation ever should be enacted in recognition of this claim, there should be a limitation in respect to the amount of attorneys' fees to be determined on a basis of quantum meruit.

The Osage Nation has a contract with Messrs. Kappler & Merillat, attorneys at law, Washington, D. C., by which said firm are to undertake to recover from the United States an amount claimed by the Indians to be due them under their interpretation of the terms of a treaty executed in 1865, and the compensation is contingent upon success, and upon the sum which may be recovered. There is involved in this claim nearly $800,000, and the committee makes the same recommendation with respect to attorneys' fees in this case as has been made with reference to the Creek equalization contract. (See Appendix, Exhibit 82, p. 1301.)

The Choctaw Nation made a contract with Mr. Ormsby McHarg, an attorney at law, New York City, in which the said McHarg is required to cooperate and advise with the general attorneys of the nation in all legal matters and questions touching the affairs of said nation. The compensation provided in this contract is $12,000 per annum, payable monthly, and in addition thereto the personal and traveling expenses of Mr. McHarg while out of the city of Washington engaged in the service of the Choctaw Nation. This contract was approved by the President as provided by section 28 of the act of April 26, 1906. (See Appendix, p. 1257.)

In the opinion of this committee this contract is not justified on business principles, and the fact that the compensation is paid from funds of a trust nature under the control of the United States as trustee makes it more important that the contract should be just and equitable than it would be if the Government were employing an attorney on its own behalf to be paid from public funds. When it is considered that McHarg receives a salary equal to that of the Attorney General of the United States and almost equal to that of the Chief Justice of the United States, the excessive compensation paid for his "cooperation and advice" in Choctaw affairs is manifest. One firm of competent attorneys is sufficient to look after the litigation and other matters of interest to the nations requiring the advice of counsel, and it is the opinion of the committee that the McHarg contract can be terminated without prejudice to the interests of the Choctaw Nation.

CONCLUDING OBSERVATIONS.

Under existing law the enrollment of the Five Civilized Tribes was completed on March 4, 1907, and no provision has since been made for the enrollment of additional persons. It appears that there are several thousand persons who are and have been for many years claiming and demanding that they be enrolled for various reasons. Undoubtedly there are some meritorious cases that should receive consideration and attention before the termination of Federal supervision of the affairs of the nations and the final distribution of the tribal estate. Most of these claimants are represented by attorneys who have contracts with them to pay from 10 to 50 per cent of the value of their interest, contingent upon enrollment, and in two instances it appears that syndicates have been formed for the purpose of prosecuting these claims. These syndicates have advanced considerable sums of money in order to enable attorneys to prosecute their work, the parties furnishing the money to be reimbursed and to participate in the net proceeds that may be derived by the attorneys under their contracts with their clients. In some instances the fee contemplated by the attorneys is not excessive considering the service and the uncertainty of success, but in others the fee provided by contract is excessive and the committee believes that if legislation is ever enacted providing for the enrollment of additional persons it should be safeguarded by a provision with reference to attorney's fees by requiring the fee to be determined on a basis of quantum meruit.

Copies of the forms of contracts of this class are submitted as exhibits in the appendix.

The committee found much sentiment among the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, a percentage equaling 85 or 90 per cent favoring the individual and tribal contracts with Mr. McMurray, contracts contemplating fees aggregating several millions of dollars, being a virtual surrender of a considerable portion of their estate. The committee, while in Oklahoma, were impressed with the fact that many members of these nations are business men of far more than ordinary ability and intelligence, who are successful in their own business affairs, some being identified with large business concerns, such as banking and commercial enterprises. These, as well as the less intelligent and more humble members of the nations, alike agreed that they had lost confidence in the capacity or desire on the part of the Government to conclude to their satisfaction their affairs. Many of these witnesses testified that they would not only pay 10 per cent, but 25 per cent, and in some instances witnesses said they would pay 35 per cent for an immediate settlement. This dissatisfaction appears to be based upon the following reasons:

Failure on the part of the Government to carry out its agreement with the Indians in not having closed up the affairs of the nations by March 4, 1907. The fact that the Government agreed that the lands allotted should be exempt from taxation for 21 years and subsequently removed the restrictions upon many of the lands by an act of Congress and thereby subjected them to taxation, has caused great dissatisfaction on the part of the Indians. The fact that there are large numbers of persons who claim the right to enrollment in one or the other of these two nations, and the fear that legislation will be enacted by which many of these persons may be enrolled and thereby materially reduce the tribal wealth per capita, has much to do with the feeling of dissatisfaction existing among the Indians and in a measure accounts for their willingness to contract to pay a substantial portion of what they may receive for an early settlement. Many of them have become discouraged, and there is more or less sentiment in these two nations that final settlement and distribution may not occur in the lifetime of the present generation.

While it is true the Government has not fulfilled assurances made to the Indians when agreements were entered into, and has not carried out fully the terms of the agreement as to the time when the final settlement was to have been made, it does not seem possible to have done more than has been done toward concluding the affairs of the nations. Delays caused on account of litigation, questions made complicated by court decisions, completing of the allotments, and many other questions that could not have been foreseen have arisen, but the Government has actively administered the affairs of the nations looking toward a final settlement, and with some additional legislation there is no reason why there should not be a termination and final settlement within the next few years.

McMurray seems to possess the confidence of a great many of the members of the two nations, due probably to the fact that he has been successful in securing legislation and in the prosecution of claims that have meant much to the nations, and there seems to be a sentiment that he possesses some mysterious power by which if he is actively employed he can facilitate an early settlement, and it is because of that sentiment and for the reasons above stated that it is easy for him to secure contracts with the two nations and with so many individual members.

For many years the Five Civilized Tribes formed a distinctive community in the Indian Territory. Each tribe had its local form of government, and all of them for many years were treated by the United States as dependent nations within its borders. The corruption and incompetence of the Indian governments became so notorious that the United States finally decided to set in motion forces looking to the ultimate termination of the Five Tribes as a distinctive community. Realizing the dominant power of the United States over them and facing the inevitable dissolution of their governments, the tribes reluctantly entered into agreements with the United States with that end in view. The history of legislation and administration having for their purpose the dissolution of the tribal governments have formed a novel chapter in our history.

The first step looking to the removal of these anomalous conditions in our form of government was to determine the rights of claimants to citizenship in the Five Tribes, with the result that the aggregate population of the several nations was found to be something over 100,000 persons. The next step in carrying out the purpose of the Federal Government, with the reluctant consent of the Indians, was to arrange for a distribution of their estate on a per captia basis among the citizens of the several tribes. The administration of their affairs has progressed to the point where their lands have been allotted to them in severalty, and the disposition of the surplus property is pressing for final action. The value of the undistributed estate has been variously estimated from $20,000,000 to $150,000,000, with the lesser amount probably approximately correct. The principal part of this estate belongs to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and consists of segregated and unallotted lands chiefly valuable for timber and minerals.

The Osage Indians, with a population of about 2,200, are estimated to be the richest people per capita on the face of the earth. They have received allotments of lands in severalty, but still have community interests in oil leases, from which large revenues are derived. Already in the Treasury of the United States a common fund stands to their credit amounting approximately to $8,000,000.

The affairs of this tribe, like the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, are being administered under the supervision of the Federal Government. It is commonplace to say that it is incumbent upon the Government at all times to promote and safeguard the material interests and the general welfare of these peoples.

Considering the general standard of intelligence and civilization of these tribes and the great value of their estate, they should be consulted by the Government in administering their affairs and should be permitted to employ counsel to represent them, not only in the courts but before the departments and the Congress, but the responsibility for action is upon the Government, and it is its duty to protect them not only from themselves, as it was decided necessary to do in the closing years of the last century, when the dissolution of their tribal government was decreed, but likewise to protect their estates from plunder by rapacious white men, to many of whom so large a prize appeals beyond their power of self-restraint. Accordingly the most thoughtful consideration should be given by both Houses of Congress to future legislation looking to the final act in the settlement of the affairs of the several tribes.

Respectfully submitted.

VIEWS OF MR. STEPHENS OF TEXAS.

I beg leave to dissent from the above majority report in so far as it disagrees with the answers to the 16 questions submitted to me for answer by the chairman of this committee.

First. Was Senator GORE approached by Jake L. Hamon substantially as charged by Senator GORE on the floor of the Senate June 24, or did Hamon make any improper proposal to Senator GORE respecting the McMurray contracts on May 6, or on any date prior or subsequent thereto?

Answer. Yes.

Second. If so, was Hamon, in whatever negotiations he may have sought with Senator GORE, acting by authority or with the consent or knowledge of McMurray?

Answer. Probably; but the evidence does not prove it beyond doubt.

Third. Was any Member of the House of Representatives approached by Hamon substantially as charged by Senator GORE in his statements on the floor of the Senate June 24, 1910?

Answer. Yes.

Fourth If so, was Hamon acting as agent of McMurray, or with his consent or knowledge?

Answer. Same as to question No. 2, but slightly more evidence.

Fifth. Was any Member of the House of Representatives interested in the McMurray contracts?

Answer. The preponderance of evidence shows a questionable activity on the part of one Member that, to my mind, indicates an interest.

Sixth. Was a Member of the Senate interested in the McMurray contracts?

Answer. The evidence does not prove such an interest.

Seventh. Was a former Senator from Nebraska interested in the McMurray contracts?

Answer. Yes.

Eighth. If so, was he improperly interested?

Answer. The evidence shows no impropriety.

Ninth. Did he attempt improperly to influence any Senator or Representative in respect to the McMurray contracts?

Answer. No testimony to show that he did.

Tenth. Was a former Senator from Kansas interested in the McMurray contracts?

Answer. Yes.

Eleventh. If so, was he improperly interested?

Answer. The evidence shows no impropriety.

Twelfth. Did he attempt improperly to influence any Senator or Representative in respect to the McMurray contracts?

Answer. The evidence does not show that he did.

Thirteenth. Was a corrupt lobby operating in Washington in the interest of Indian contracts during the second session of the Sixty-first Congress?

Answer. The evidence shows that one person at least made corrupt proposals in connection with such contracts.

Fourteenth. If so, did such lobby improperly influence any Representative or Senator, or did any member of such lobby make any improper overtures to any Member of Congress?

Answer. The answer to this question may be found in answer to questions 5 and 13.

Fifteenth. Was bribery, fraud, or any undue influence exerted on behalf of the approval or procuring of contracts between J. F. McMurray or any other person or persons, and the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians or any members thereof, or any other of the Five Civilized Tribes, the Osage Indians or any members thereof?

Answer. The evidence proves an improper proposal to D. C. McCurtain on the part of McMurray, an improper proposal to Gov. Green McCurtain on the part of George W. Scott, and an improper proposal to W. A. Durant, speaker of the Choctaw Council, by George W. Scott and Tom Sanguin, as well as other questionable methods and transactions.

Sixteenth. Subsequent to May 6, 1910, were Senator GORE's relations with Hamon and his conduct toward McMurray such as to justify the belief that he (GORE) treated any improper overtures made by Hamon as seriously made by Hamon or made with the knowledge or consent of McMurray?

Answer. The conduct of Senator GORE taken as a whole, including the final disclosures and the conduct of his secretaries, leaves no room to doubt that he regarded Hamon's offer as serious and as authorized by McMurray. It is impossible for me to believe or imagine that he regarded Hamon's offer as a jest or as a joke.

I do not feel called upon to speculate upon this subject; that duty is not imposed upon me. There is no fixed standard of conduct in such a case. Different men would act differently under such circumstances according to the differences of temperament and judgment. Some men perhaps would have answered with a blow. GORE stated that Hamon had done him some favor, and said in substance that he thought it might be best to allow events to take their course, with the idea that sufficient evidence might accumulate which would leave no doubt as to the guilty parties and their guilty connections. This motive and object was justifiable and his conduct consistent with the end in view. He forbade Hamon to mention the subject to him again and the visits of Hamon and the visits of McMurray were of their own seeking. His opposition to the contracts was active from May 6 until the disclosure was made in the Senate. He wrote letters of protest to the Attorney General. He secured the passage of a bill on May 12 to prohibit the contracts. He offered an amendment to a House bill for the same purpose on or about June 6, and finally secured an amendment to the general deficiency bill on June 21. He advised his brother of Hamon's offer immediately after it was made, also told Senator LA FOLLETTE during the afternoon. He told his wife that night and Congressman CARTER the next day. He assured LA FOLLETTE that he would make the disclosure whenever, if ever, it became necessary to protect the Indians. He did make the disclosure when it became necessary for the protection of the Indians. He stated that he would do his duty when the occasion arose, and, in my judgment, he did his duty when the occasion arose. I am not sure that a man should be subjected to criticism for deferring the performance of such a duty until the necessity became imperative, and I do not care to indulge in speculations upon conventional deportment under the stress of such circumstances.

It is my judgment that had Senator GORE not made the statement, first to a conference committee on an Indian bill and later on the same day to the open Senate, exposing the corrupt methods attempted by Hamon to secure the approval of the McMurray contracts, said contracts would have been approved. These statements by GORE put the House of Representatives on its guard and prevented the approval of the contracts, and this caused the investigation, and it is my firm belief that Senator GORE deserves the commendation of all honest men in making it possible to defeat those outrageous contracts which, if ratified, would have despoiled the Indians of several million dollars.

I further dissent from the views of the majority in their report in this: The report denies that there was a corrupt lobby in Washington seeking the approval of the McMurray contracts, except Hamon only. The fact is that Senator GORE did not use the words "corrupt lobby," but did say that a "powerful lobby" was in Washington in McMurray's behalf. There was, I maintain, a powerful lobby engaged by McMurray. He admits having in his employ two ex-United States Senators—Long and Thurston—also Dick Adams, whose telegraphic activity in McMurray's behalf was amazing. I find that the legal definition of "lobby" is "to urge the passage of a bill by personal influence addressed to the individual legislator." The duty of these employees—Long, Thurston, and Adams—would compel them to lobby through Congress, at that session, the very kind of an amendment that MCGUIRE says he received from either McMurray or Gov. Johnson and had Mr. TAWNEY offer it as an amendment to a bill before a conference committee; this amendment, if it had been incorporated in the law, would have, through the agency of MCGUIRE, secured to McMurray the approval of contracts that would have been worth to him a vast sum of money, and would have despoiled the Indians of the same. The majority members of this committee have heretofore, through the public press, acquitted Mr. MCGUIRE of having any interest in these contracts.

Through the agency of Senator GORE in exposing these contracts in the Senate, as shown by the evidence, this MCGUIRE amendment was defeated, thus defeating the McMurray contracts and causing this investigation to be ordered.

I further dissent from the majority report because in effect it states that there is nothing showing that McMurray knew of Hamon's corrupt activity in his behalf. Is any person credulous enough to believe that McMurray and Hamon and McGuire, all of whom are shown by the evidence to have lived at that time in the Occidental Hotel in this city (and admit being often together), did not discuss these McMurray contracts or endeavor in any way to aid him to secure their approval? This report states, as framed by the majority, that the fact that Hamon once went to GORE'S house is a suspicious circumstance—to show, I presume, collusion of friendship between them—yet this majority report wholly ignores the fact that Hamon, the same man that was once seen with GORE, lived in the same hotel with McMurray and McGuire—thus ignoring everything that would tend to show that Hamon, McGuire, and McMurray were in each other's confidence—and was aiding McMurray in every way he could to secure the approval of these contracts, as I have stated above.

JNO. H. STEPHENS.

ORGANIZED MILITIA.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That under such regulations as the Secretary of War and the National Militia Board shall prescribe each enlisted man of the Organized Militia of each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall receive in compensation for his services, other than at annual encampments or in case of riot, insurrection, or invasion, 25 per cent of the annual rate of pay for enlisted men of like grade in the Army of the United States as is now or may be hereafter established by law for attendance upon 48 drills or equivalent military duty prescribed by statutes or in orders by the commander in chief of his State or Territory or the commanding general of the District of Columbia during any one year, or a proportionate amount for attendance upon any number of drills or equivalent military duty not less than 20: Provided, That no compensation shall be paid for attendance at less than 20 such drills or equivalent military duty: Provided further, That the compensation provided for herein shall be computed and paid semiannually as proportioned above: And provided further, That no compensation hereunder shall be paid to any enlisted man, except noncombatants, in the first year of his enlistment unless and until he shall have made a record score with the prescribed weapon of his arm of the service, nor thereafter unless and until he shall have fired the prescribed course or such equivalent as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War and the National Militia Board.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 22, strike out the words "or may be hereafter."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I desire to offer which strikes out the language which is sought to be stricken out by the committee amendment. If my motion takes preference, I want to submit it at this time.

Mr. TURNBULL rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. TURNBULL. To offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, strike out all after the word "invasion" to and including the word "law," in line 23, and insert "not to exceed $45 per annum."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, under the bill as at present constituted, enlisted men in the Organized Militia may receive not to exceed 25 per cent of the pay of an enlisted man in the Regular Army. The pay of an enlisted man in the Regular Army is $15 a month, or $180 a year. The amendment proposed by me provides than an enlisted man in the Organized Militia shall receive not to exceed $45 per annum.

The purpose is, Mr. Speaker, to avoid the agitation for an increase of the percentage of the pay of enlisted men in the Army in case this bill becomes a law. If it be deemed sufficient now to pay 25 per cent of the pay of an enlisted man in the Army, as that amount can be fixed definitely, I imagine those favoring this bill would be willing to place the amount in the bill. If we enact this bill into law and provide that 25 per cent of the pay of enlisted men in the Regular Army be paid to men in the Organized Militia, pressure to increase the percentage will immediately commence and it will not cease until the enlisted men in the Organized Militia are obtaining 100 per cent of the pay of an enlisted man in the Regular Army. As soon as they are paid the 100 per cent, then a movement to increase the pay of enlisted men in the Regular Army, in order that the enlisted men in the Organized Militia might be the beneficiaries, would be irresistible.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman understand that the words "or may be hereafter" have been stricken out?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, I understand that. If the gentleman will permit, it refers, unless I am mistaken, to the grade, not to the amount of pay. It says, "annual rate of pay for enlisted men of like grade"——

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no.

Mr. FITZGERALD. "As is now or may be hereafter established" the "hereafter" refers to the grade, not to the rate of pay.

Mr. DALZELL. It clearly relates to the rate of pay.

Mr. HAY. It refers to the number of men who may hereafter be put in the Army Establishment.

Mr. DALZELL. Where does the gentleman's amendment end; what is the line that is stricken out?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My amendment ends with the word "law" in line 23. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will realize that men in the Army get longevity pay and the grades are fixed by the length of service. Now, if some additional grade be established it will make that difference and it will create this pressure for an increase of the percentage of the men to be paid.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will allow me, there are half a dozen ways and variations of paying these soldiers; some of them get increase in the amount of pay for fine marksmanship, and some have longevity pay, and some get pay for one thing and another.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not see any objection to that myself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am inclined to believe that if the understanding is that we are to pay $45 a year, which is 25 per cent of the pay——

Mr. DALZELL. That is the way the bill reads now; that is what the bill means now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is considerable doubt about the effect of the bill as it now stands. If we put in the amount which equals 25 per cent, there can be no doubt, and it eliminates that question.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will state to the gentleman——

Mr. FITZGERALD The gentleman realizes there will be a movement to increase the percentage, and we eliminate that danger by fixing the amount that may be paid.

Mr. STEENERSON. I was going to say to the gentleman, if he is willing to listen, that all the officers who appeared before the committee stated that according to their computation it amounted to $48 a year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I will substitute "forty-eight" for the "forty-five," and that will make $1 a drill. Mr. Speaker, I ask to modify my amendment by changing "forty-five" to "forty-eight."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment so it will read as the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, strike out all after the word "invasion" down to and including the word "law," in line 22, and insert "not to exceed $48 per annum."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question first recurs on the amendment reported by the Committee on Rules to perfect the text, which is to strike out, in line 22, the words "or may be hereafter."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to strike out and insert.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TURNBULL] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the paragraph after word "above," in line 8 of page 3, and insert the following:

"And provided further, That enlisted men, except noncombatants, shall receive as compensation hereunder only one-half of the compensation herein provided in the first year of their enlistment and until they shall have made a record score with the prescribed weapon of their arm of the service, nor thereafter until they shall have fired the prescribed course or such equivalent as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War and the National Militia Board."

Mr. TURNBULL. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, one of the great troubles is to keep the companies up to the required practice. A provision contained in the bill now does not allow the enlisted men anything for the first year. Therefore this provision contained in the bill does not tend to cause the men to enlist, for they receive no pay at all during the first year. And the object of my amendment is to allow them one-half of the pay provided by the bill during the first year and until they come up to the required standard.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment will be voted down. The bill is all right as it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded with and completed the reading of the bill.

The following amendments, reported in the rules, were also read:

Strike out all of lines 23, 24, and 25, and on page 4, line 1, down to and including the word "Provided."

In line 14, page 4, insert the words "on the charge of desertion."

In line 16, after the word "conviction," strike out "shall be guilty of the crime of desertion and."

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I wish to offer to the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment provided for by the rule.

Page 3, strike out lines 23, 24, and 25; and on page 4, strike out line 25; and on page 4, line 1, strike out "otherwise appropriated: Provided."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will have opportunity at the proper time. The Clerk will now report the other amendments provided for in the rule, which are amendments to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the committee amendment, page 4, line 14, after the word "trial" by inserting the words "on the charge of desertion."

In line 16, after the word "conviction," strike out "shall be adjudged guilty of the crime of desertion and."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer my amendment now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 5, on page 4, beginning in line 1, by striking out the colon and by inserting a period, and by striking out all the remainder of the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas that that portion of section 5 before the colon, on the top of page, has already been striken out.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Then I move to strike out the whole section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not a question now of striking out. It is a question of agreeing to the amendment as amended. All the gentleman needs to do to strike it out is to see that it is not agreed to.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I would like to be heard for a moment.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. Is all of the language after the word "appropriated" on page 4 an amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is all a committee amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. And if it fails of adoption——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There will be nothing left to section 5.

Mr. GARRETT. Then that will eliminate section 5 entirely?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will eliminate section 5.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Section 5, with the proviso, which itself is an amendment, contains the amendment proposed by the War Department, which I have urged as a most serious objection to this bill. I do not desire to take up the time of the House, but will simply state that the amendment proposed by the War Department, and to which I most seriously object, may be stricken out by voting down this committee amendment.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, in the rule as reported, that amendment, so called, on page 4, after the word "provided," is treated as part of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Well, it is a part of the bill as reported, but it is a committee amendment, and the rule does not provide for the treatment of any of the amendments in any other way than that in which they are ordinarily treated in the consideration of a bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. DALZELL. It makes no difference, except that——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas) there were—ayes 99, noes 61.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (after counting). Twenty-three gentlemen have risen; not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I renew my demand for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Speaker pro tempore designated Mr. DALZELL and Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, nays 74.

So the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

On page 4, after line 25, add the following:

"And provided further, That all officers of the militia holding commissions at the time they are called into the service of the United States, and reported fit for military service by the Secretary of War, and so carried upon the rolls of The Adjutant General of the Army, shall be nominated for a commission by the President of the United States for the rank for which such officer is found qualified, and when confirmed by the Senate shall be commissioned by the President as an officer in the military service of the United States for the period for which the organization with which said officer is to perform duty is accepted."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order on that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. HAY. It is not germane, and it provides by law to have these officers put into the United States Army, while this bill pertains entirely to the Organized Militia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the bill is so broad that it would warrant the amendment, so far as its being germane is concerned. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOWLAND] is recognized.

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House in an attempt to discuss this amendment at length, but I wish to say that we might as well frankly state the object sought to be accomplished by this bill, and that is that this legislation is intended to make of the National Guard of the several States a strictly Federal force. My amendment provides that as soon as officers of the National Guard are called into the service of the United States the appointments which they hold as officers of the militia under the governors of the several States shall terminate and they shall then be commissioned by the President of the United States, with the consent of the Senate, so that the officers of the military arm of this Government in actual service in time of war shall derive their authority from and hold their commissions under the Federal Government. We have read somewhere that a man can not serve two masters. This applies with all its original force to the military service, both as to men and officers.

Mr. ANTHONY. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Would not the effect of the gentleman's amendment be that in States which have about 100 colonels to a dozen privates they would put all those colonels and major generals right into the Federal service?

Mr. HOWLAND. No; under my amendment many might be called and few chosen.

Mr. TAWNEY. Right in that line I want to suggest this: Is not the purpose of this bill to increase the efficiency of the militia, so that it can be utilized in case of war? And would it not be proper, therefore, to provide that all officers who have been educated at the expense of the Federal Government in the manner provided in this bill shall be eligible to appointment as commissioned officers in the event of war?

Mr. HOWLAND. I see no objection to that; but the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] asked me a question. My amendment provides that when those gentlemen who hold commissions in the National Guard are called into the service of the United States, if found by the Federal authorities to be fit, may receive commissions from the President, with the consent of the Senate, and hold the same during the time that the organization to which they belong remains in the Federal service, so that it does not take them into the Federal military establishment at all, except during the time that their organizations remain in the service.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is not the gentleman's amendment too broad? Is not the organization of some of the States top-heavy with major generals, and would you not create an army of major generals?

Mr. HOWLAND. Oh, it is not compulsory that they be taken into the service, because under the bill as now drawn, before I offered this amendment, they can be taken or left, just as the Federal authorities please, and their rank would not be determined by that which they held in the militia, but on the military qualifications which they satisfy the Federal authorities that they possessed at the time they were commissioned in the Federal Army.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the bill contemplated the appointment of the officers of the militia by the President of the United States?

Mr. HOWLAND. The bill does not, but I propose to find out whether some of the enthusiasm back of this bill to make a Federal force will go to the extent of allowing the Federal Government to name the officers in that Federal force. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is familiar with the provision of the Constitution——

Mr. HOWLAND. I am familiar with that clause in the Constitution.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is familiar with the provision which requires that the appointment of the officers is reserved to the States, respectively.

Mr. HOWLAND. For the militia; but as soon as the militia go into the Federal service they become a Federal force and cease to be a State force. That is just the point exactly. Therefore the power should attach to the Federal Government to appoint the officers, and all officers in the military service of the United States should derive their power from the Federal Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman wait one moment? I should like to have him construe this provision of the Constitution, that Congress has power—

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

Mr. HOWLAND. That provides for the appointment of officers in the militia by the governors, and I have no quarrel with that clause in the Constitution, but I make the point that when the militia is called into the service of the United States they cease from that moment to be militia and become Federal soldiers; and they then come squarely under the constitutional provisions, which says Congress shall have power to provide—

For governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States.

I know that the States are jealous of this power, and I also know that in our history all kinds of friction has grown out of this very situation. Political generals and lesser officers have been foisted onto the Federal Government in times past, and probably will be again in the future unless some change is made.

Now, when the militia organizations of the States are knocking at the doors of the Federal Treasury, is the best time in the world to place a legislative construction upon the particular clause in the Constitution which has been the cause of so much difficulty in the past, and make of the officers, as well as the men of the militia, a real dependable Federal force.

I am in sympathy with the main objects of this legislation, but if the militia is to be "organized, armed, disciplined, and equipped" at Federal expense and placed on the Federal pay roll in time of peace, it is no more than fair that when called into actual service in time of war it should be a real Federal force. The enlisted man under this bill is getting the short end of this bargain and the officers the long end. The enlisted man must serve two years after he is called into the service of the United States, even though his term of enlistment may be almost at an end, and is subject to court-martial as a deserter if he does not respond promptly. The officers are in terms covered in the same language, but it is easy to get officers, and, in fact, they might not be wanted, but every enlisted man would be forced to respond promptly.

While there seems now to be considerable enthusiasm for this bill among the National Guard, I am afraid the hope of a Federal appropriation has caused them to overlook some points in this legislation which may in the future rise up to plague them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this amendment. I am opposed to this bill, which carries with it this section 5, because it undertakes to take away from the States the right to organize the militia, which is required by the Constitution. The amendment with it will absolutely destroy the National Guard or the militia in the States. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOWLAND] is candid enough and open and frank enough to offer an amendment which will go to the extent that you ought to go if you undertake to pass this bill—that is, to destroy forever the right of the States to organize and train the militia in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

I for one would be glad to favor the militia or the National Guard in all the States. In every war they have rendered the services which the citizen soldiery of our country are noted for. They have perpetuated this Government in war by their valor and deeds of courage on the battle field, and I am not willing for any reason to strike down from the States the power and the right and the duty to train and organize the militia of our country in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. [Applause.] This bill will not aid the militia; it may aid a few officers in the militia, but the end of it will be to injure the militia as a whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to place on the pension rolls under any existing law any officer or enlisted man serving in the Organized Militia of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia under the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the last amendment as a new section, as follows:

SEC. 6. The Secretary of War shall annually estimate the amount necessary for the carrying out of this act, and no money shall be expended hereunder except as it shall from time to time be appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the engrossed bill is not here, and the bill will be laid aside for the present.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5037. An act for the relief of G. A. Embry; to the Committee on War Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

H. R. 26606. An act for the relief of Charles A. Caswell.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and agree to the following resolution (H. Res. 1002).

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be in order to consider as a part of the bill (H. R. 32957) making appropriations for the several deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1911, for prior years, and for other purposes, that portion of the printed copy of the bill contained on pages 82 to 85, numbered as section 3, relating to the proposed fidelity division of the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MACON. I demand a second.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CARLIN) there were—ayes 29, noes 134.

So the motion to adjourn was lost.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas demands a second. Under the rule a second is considered as ordered. The gentleman from Minnesota is entitled to 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Arkansas to 20 minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the only effect of the adoption of this resolution will be to make the fidelity bonding division in the general deficiency bill in order, so that no Member, however great may be his interest in the fidelity bonding business, can take the provision out of the bill on a point of order. When the provision is reached an opportunity will then be given for consideration on its merits. When this resolution is agreed to it will afford the House an opportunity to proceed with the consideration of the general deficiency bill, and I trust that there will be no objection to its adoption.

Mr. MACON. The only purpose is to make section 3 in order on the appropriation bill, as I understand it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; it does not pass the provision.

Mr. MACON. The bill will be considered in the regular way?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; under the five-minute rule, and so will this provision be considered in the regular way; it will be read and an opportunity given for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the general deficiency appropriation bill, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that all general debate be closed in five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the general deficiency bill, and pending that, asks that all general debate in Committee of the Whole be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. TAWNEY was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CURRIER in the chair.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill (H. R. 32957) has been read in full to-day. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to add to what I said this afternoon with respect to the various provisions and recommendations carried in this bill. The only provision of any importance that is likely to provoke any discussion is the provision providing for the creating of a fidelity bonding division in the departments and authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe rates of premium to be paid by bonded officers, agents, and employees of the Government. I do not care to go into a discussion of that provision now or to occupy the time of the committee for that purpose. I desire to commence the reading of the bill as soon as possible, and unless some gentleman desires the balance of my time in general debate I will ask that the reading of the bill be proceeded with.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

International Seismological Association: For defraying the necessary expenses in fulfilling the obligations of the United States as a member of the International Seismological Association, including the annual contribution to the expenses of the association for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, $800.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I am not sure, but I do not believe that there is any law on which to base this appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is authorized by an international agreement. This is our contribution to the international agreement.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does it not relate to the same subject that was up in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill the other evening?

Mr. TAWNEY. I don't know whether it does or not. It may be the same subject. This is a deficiency.

Mr. BENNET of New York. It is the same subject, but it is not subject to a point of order. This is a deficiency.

Mr. TAWNEY. Our contribution for this fiscal year has not been appropriated yet.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

International Union for Protection of Industrial Property: For additional amount required for defraying the expenses of the next meeting of the International Union for the Protection of Industrial Property, to be held at the city of Washington, D. C., in May, 1911, $10,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this is authorized also by an international agreement, and the invitation was extended three years ago to this association to hold its next meeting in the city of Washington. The appropriation carried in the last Congress for this purpose was $10,000, since which time the representatives of South American countries, to the number of sixty-odd, have accepted the invitation, and it is necessary to provide for the entertainment of these additional delegates.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the purpose of the association?

Mr. TAWNEY. The purpose of the association is to consider and if possible devise uniformity of copyright laws and patent-right laws. It is of the utmost importance.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The appropriation of $75,000 carried in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, concerning the boundary waters between the United States and Canada, may be used for the rent of buildings in the District of Columbia, from the date of the approval of said sundry civil act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that to get some information.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the necessity for that paragraph is this: There was an appropriation of $75,000 carried in the last sundry civil appropriation bill, the one that passed at the last session of Congress, for defraying the expenses of the commission.

The State Department under that authority rented some rooms here in the old Pan-American or American Republics Building. The Secretary of State was of the opinion that the appropriation authorized the payment of the rent and gave specific instructions for its payment. The disbursing officer, on the order of the Secretary of State, made the payment. Now this is for the purpose of legalizing the payment of the rent because the Auditor for the War Department holds that under the act of 1882 that rent can not be paid unless it is specifically authorized. The Secretary of State being one of the great lawyers of the country, the disbursing officer has nothing to do but to pay it. Now this is to make this payment for the balance of the fiscal year out of the $75,000 appropriated for the commission at the last session of Congress.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman; I understand this is not for the old commission that has been in existence for a number of years.

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

Mr. MANN. Then I withdraw the point of order as far as I am concerned.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I reserved the point of order first. How much of the $75,000 will be required to pay this rent?

Mr. TAWNEY. Something like $3,000, and it is divided among three commissions. There are three commissions that will occupy rooms in this building. One is the commission appointed to fix the boundary line between Mexico and Texas, the other is the British Claims Commission, and the other is the International Joint Commission.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. How much is it altogether?

Mr. TAWNEY. Three thousand dollars a year for all.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Why do you require the $75,000 additional appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. We are not requiring $75,000. This $3,000 will be taken out of the $75,000, which was appropriated last year for the International Joint Commission, which commission has not yet been appointed.

Mr. MANN. And the old appropriation will not be available for payment of rent in Washington.

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Seventy-five thousand dollars was appropriated last year, and $75,000 is appropriated this year for the same purpose.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; but the appropriation for this year does not become available until the 1st of July.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I asked the gentleman why he wanted an appropriation of $75,000 additional for this year, when there was $75,000 appropriated last year, none of which was expended.

Mr. MANN. Because that lapsed at the end of the year——

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. What became of the balance of it?

Mr. TAWNEY. It goes back to the Treasury.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Does the chairman say that?

Mr. TAWNEY. The balance, unless Congress reappropriates the balance, always goes back into the Treasury under the covering-in act.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. When the sundry civil bill was up I was trying to find out why you appropriated an additional $75,000 instead of reappropriating the amount heretofore authorized. I thought then, perhaps, you were wanting $150,000 for this commission.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from New York knows that the appropriation made for the fiscal year 1911 is available for expenditure until the 30th of June of this year. Now, if the commission is appointed and goes to work, the appropriation for this year will be available to defray expenses of the work during the remainder of this year. How much will be unexpended for the balance of this fiscal year no one can at this time determine. The $75,000 appropriated for the fiscal year 1912 will not become available until the 1st of July.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. How much is paid now by the Government for rent for all purposes?

Mr. TAWNEY. Five hundred thousand dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse the Treasurer of the United States for the loss which occurred in his office on January 11, 1911, without negligence or fault on his part, $1,000.40.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order against the section. I would like to ask the chairman what is the occasion of this appropriation, commencing in line 22, page 4, and ending with line 25?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, the occasion for that is simply this: The employees in the redemption division of the Treasury Department are not bonded to anybody, either to the United States or to the Treasury. A loss occurred there four or five months ago and the department has endeavored in every way possible to ascertain who was responsible for that loss. It is not due to the fault or neglect of the Treasury. There is, in addition to this, an amount of something over a million dollars carried on the books of the Treasury as an unavailable balance, which represents losses that have occurred and for which Congress has been asked, and has on many occasions granted relief.

Now, unless this is done, the Treasurer, who is in no way responsible for the loss, must make good that loss, although he has no more to do with the appointment of employees in the division than the Members of Congress have. And this illustrates what I tried to explain to the House this afternoon, namely, the necessity for the enactment of the legislation which the Committee on Appropriations has recommended in this bill, namely, requiring all officers, agents, and employees of the Government to give their bonds direct to the United States Government. It is hardly fair, in view of the practice and custom of Congress, to relieve principals under circumstances of this kind and hold the Treasurer, who is in no way responsible, for the fault or theft, or whatever it may be, and require him to reimburse the Government for that amount.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, is not the office there supplied with Secret Service men and detectives?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; and Secret Service men have been engaged, I will say, in this case for some time.

Mr. CULLOP. What were they doing when this occurred?

Mr. TAWNEY. Secret Service men are not employed in the Redemption Division all the time.

Mr. CULLOP. Do they not have a corps of detectives in there?

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no; they do not.

Mr. CULLOP. Congress has been very liberal in relieving Treasurers and subtreasurers from these losses.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the gentleman from Indiana ever been in the Redemption Division of the Treasury Department?

Mr. CULLOP. I do not think I have.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman should go down there.

Mr. CULLOP. I do not think I need to go down there, but I do think there should be somebody in control of the office to look more after the business of it than has been done, it seems, in the case of these Treasurers and subtreasurers. These losses are occurring too often.

Now, it seems to me that if the man who has charge of that office was giving attention to the duties of it as he should do, these losses would not occur, or if they did occur they would be immediately known. There is no reason why they should not. They check up every day, or they ought to, at least. It seems to be the practice now that they are not doing that, and yet last year we appropriated for that office a very large sum to install new business methods there on the ground that the old ones were antiquated and out of date.

Mr. DAWSON. If the gentleman will permit me, as he is well aware, the national banks pay all the expense of operating the Redemption Division, so it is not coming out of the Public Treasury at all.

Mr. CULLOP. No. In the Treasury Department last year a very large sum was appropriated to improve the business methods there, and from the reports that are constantly coming in on appropriations to make good the losses that have occurred there, it seems that either some new business methods or new men ought to be instituted and installed for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I move to strike out the last word. I would suggest that if they had allowed the Secret Service force to be used for other purposes except the guarding of the person of the President or the detection of counterfeiters they might not have gotten into this trouble.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Secret Service force has been trying to discover who it was that committed the theft for some time, and have not yet been able to do it.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. They have not been allowed to chase thieves.

Mr. TAWNEY. They have been allowed to do so under the existing law.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And they have nobody to guard the Treasury, since the Secretary of the Treasury is not permitted to employ the detective force for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For classifying, indexing, exhibiting, and properly caring for the returns of all corporations required by section 38 of an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, including the employment in the District of Columbia of such clerical and other personal services and for rent of such quarters as may be necessary, $5,000: Provided, That any and all such returns shall be open to inspection only upon the order of the President, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and approved by the President.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order against that paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman make a point of order or reserve it?

Mr. CULLOP. I reserve it for the present.

Mr. TAWNEY. I suggest that the gentleman make it, because we can dispose of that very readily.

Mr. CULLOP. Then I will make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state to the gentleman that that is authorized by the tariff act.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to call attention to the proviso at the close of the section. That is the matter against which I make the point of order, commencing with the word "Provided," on line 11, and ending with the word "President," on line 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Minnesota if that is a change of existing law?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that that proviso was agreed to at the first regular session of this Congress and is the law to-day. It was not in the original act, but by an amendment to that law at the last session of Congress the proviso was added to the existing law.

The Chair will remember that the original act provided for a tabulation of all returns and the making them available for inspection by everybody. At the last session of Congress that provision was amended so that only those returns that are ordered by the President to be made available for that purpose can be examined or inspected.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the recollection of the Chair. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Refund of sums paid for documentary stamps: The time within which claims may be presented for refunding the sums paid for documentary stamps used on foreign bills of exchange drawn between July 1, 1898, and June 30, 1901, against the value of products or merchandise actually exported to foreign countries, specified in the act entitled "An act to provide for refunding stamp taxes paid under the act of June 30, 1898, upon foreign bills of exchange drawn between July 1, 1898, and June 30, 1901, against the value of products or merchandise actually exported to foreign countries and authorizing rebate of duties on anthracite coal imported into the United States from October 6, 1902, to January 15, 1903, and for other purposes," approved February 1, 1909, be, and is hereby, extended to December 1, 1911.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from South Carolina on his point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I simply reserve the point of order to ascertain why the time is extended.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the law requiring the placing of documentary stamps on bills of exchange to be unconstitutional. It was the Spanish-American War revenue act that authorized them. A great deal of money has been collected under that provision. Subsequently Congress passed an act authorizing the Internal Revenue Bureau to refund the amounts collected on foreign bills of exchange. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States was based upon the theory that this operated as an export tax, and was therefore violative of the Constitution.

Of course it required a great deal of time for some of the claimants to collect their testimony. The act fixed the time within which all claims should be submitted. We have since that time twice extended that time limit. The last time limit expired on the 1st of December last. Now, there have come to the attention of the department some two or three claims——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. What do they amount to?

Mr. TAWNEY. Aggregating about $6,000. The circumstances were such that the parties were clearly not guilty of any laches in not presenting the claims, and the Internal Revenue Bureau has recommended that the extension should be made that is asked for here because the tax was illegal. The Government, of course, has no legal right to retain the amount that was collected. The department thinks this will close up those cases entirely. The department knows of only two or three claims, aggregating between $6,000 and $7,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The explanation is perfectly satisfactory to me, but I was particularly anxious to know if the gentleman was in possession of information that would show that these people were not guilty of negligence.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state, for the information of the gentleman from South Carolina, one case that I have personal knowledge of. It is the case of the firm of the Washburn-Crosby Co., of Minneapolis, the largest milling concern, I think, in the United States. They do a very large export business.

The man in the office who had charge of collecting this evidence and correspondence with their foreign representatives, was taken ill. The people in the office did not know anything about the matter, and this man was sent away on account of his health, and because of that fact the time expired within which the concern hoped that they would be ready and prepared to file their claim. That is one of the claims of which I have personal knowledge.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I am satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MINTS AND ASSAY OFFICES.

Assay office at New York: Authority is hereby granted the Secretary of the Treasury to use of the unexpended balance to the credit of the appropriation for parting and refining bullion the sum of $25,000 for the purposes herein stated: To provide lighting fixtures, new melting furnaces, additional scales, balances, and other necessary apparatus, appliances, and equipment, including house telephone and time and watchman's clock systems and office furniture; or so much thereof as may be necessary for the proper equipment of the new assay office, the same to be immediately available.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have read in the public prints that the assay office in the city which I have the honor in part to represent, is practically falling down, and that a request was made to this Congress to provide an appropriation to keep it standing.

Mr. TAWNEY. The sundry civil bill carries the appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The amount in the sundry civil bill carries what is needed?

Mr. TAWNEY. This is merely to furnish some new equipment, out of the permanent, indefinite appropriation. It covers what is needed in the assay office in the new part.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman is probably correct, but there is a chance that he may have confused the two things. They are building in the rear of the old assay office in New York City a nine-story building.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. And that building, I hope, is in no danger of falling down.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is the old part in front.

Mr. BENNET of New York. As I read the item that was carried in the sundry civil bill, I do not think it covered the subject of propping up the old assay office during construction.

Mr. TAWNEY. That part of it was carried in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill passed in the beginning of this session.

Mr. BENNET of New York. At any rate, the appropriations in the three bills meet all the needs of the building, do they?

Mr. TAWNEY. They meet all the needs of the office.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

All laws and parts of laws, to the extent that they make a permanent indefinite appropriation for the expenses of parting and refining bullion, are repealed to take effect from and after June 30, 1912, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall, for the fiscal year 1913, and annually thereafter, submit to Congress, in the regular Book of Estimates, detailed estimates for the expenses of this service.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to strike out of line 19 the words "parting and refining bullion."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 19 strike out "parting and refining bullion."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I will perfect the amendment later if I can get any encouragement from my friend on the other side.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think when the gentleman hears from his friend on this side, he will not want to make any amendment whatever.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. One of the greatest evils that has come under my observation in the 10 year's service I have had in this House is the practice of Congress in passing laws which require annual appropriations without estimates being submitted. I think the chairman of this committee, after his long and useful service, will bear me out in saying that these laws providing for permanent appropriations ought never to have gone upon the statute books, and that most of them ought to be repealed if it is practicable to do so.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what we propose to do here.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is what you do.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I wanted to strike out the language making it applicable to one particular statute. Of course it is subject to a point of order, but I wanted to strike out the language which makes this legislation applicable to this particular statute only, and to make it applicable to all the laws, and require estimates to be submitted.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am in hearty sympathy with the gentleman so far as he desires to repeal the permanent appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations has in the last six years endeavored on every occasion to recommend the repeal of permanent appropriations; for example, this bill carries the recommendation to repeal the permanent appropriation of $5,500,000 for the collecting of customs. As soon as the bill was reported to the House every Member who had a customs office in his district, where the cost of running the office is greater than the income, became worried for fear it would affect his office and threatened to make points of order and vote against the suspension of the rules until I agreed to strike out that objectionable paragraph.

I will say to the gentleman that the discovery of this permanent appropriation was by accident. The chief of the service, the Director of the Mint, submitted an estimate of $25,000 to be paid out of the permanent appropriation. That permanent appropriation nobody knew existed, but when we came to inquire we found there was an unexpended balance of $450,000, due to modern methods of parting and refining. Prior to the modern methods of parting and refining the by-products were all lost; but now, under the new methods of parting and refining, the by-products are preserved and are valuable. In one by-product last year the Government realized over $100,000 from the sale of it, and for that reason we concluded hereafter that they could come to Congress with their estimates and we would turn in all of the products.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I hope my friend the chairman will not misunderstand me. I did not make a point of order against this legislation, but I offered the amendment so as to cut off the possibility of it being cut out of this bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. The proposition of the gentleman, so far as it affects other permanent appropriations, I think he will see, is impracticable and would only complicate matters and leave in doubt whether we effected the repeal of this, and I trust he will not insist on his amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I understand that. I offered the amendment and thereby it became impossible for this legislation to go out on a point of order after the discussion began. I find the chairman of the committee agrees with me that these laws providing for permanent appropriations ought not to be enacted. I find that he could not repeal all these laws at one time, because he might interfere with so many that it would make it impossible. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment, and hope that later we will be able to get more of them repealed.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Minnesota a question. I am in sympathy with his purpose, but have not had much opportunity to think this over, and I submit this observation: In the assay office, with which I am more particularly familiar, you can take bullion or anything else from which they can extract gold and they will immediately pay you 98 per cent of the value of the gold that can be extracted from what you bring, and when the gold is refined they pay you the balance. Or you can leave the bullion, and when they get it assayed they will give you the gold less the expense of assaying.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is exactly the practice.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Now, does the repealing of this permanent indefinite appropriation in any way affect that practice?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; that was taken into consideration when it was drawn. It is only so much of the law as authorizes the permanent indefinite appropriation. This provision is carefully guarded.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I hope it is.

Mr. DAWSON. I might add that the Director of the Mint stated that there would be no objection from the standpoint of the service.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Director of the Mint heartily agrees in this, and the committee has carefully guarded the provision so that it will not relieve the owner of the bullion, or whatever he may carry there, for parting and refining, from the charge which the law now imposes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I have a high personal regard for the gentleman from Iowa, the Director of the Mint, and the immigration officials who submitted to do away with the permanent appropriation for immigration, but I notice they overlooked a kink, and it may be that these people have.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I think we have guarded against everything.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to take occasion to commend the legislation carried in this paragraph, about which we have had some discussion, and also embrace this opportunity to express my appreciation of the valuable services of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]. [Applause.] No man in this House can fully and truthfully estimate the invaluable services rendered the country by the gentleman who heads that committee. I was connected with the House of Representatives more than 30 years ago as one of its subordinate officers, and I have watched with a great deal of interest and followed carefully the career of the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and I want to say this, that I hope with the termination of the present session of Congress the American people will not part with the long, splendid, and valuable experience which he has gained at the head of this great committee. It was my opportunity in the first Republican caucus on the roll call to cast my vote for JAMES A. TAWNEY for Speaker of the House of Representatives, and while I am not an old man, nothing in this life would give me greater pleasure than to vote for this same gentleman for President of the United States, one of the best-equipped men in the country for that exalted position. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Assay office at Deadwood, S. Dak.: Assayer in charge, additional compensation for the fiscal year 1912, $250.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I observe from the hearings that the Director of the Mint recommended this increase because of the increased business at Deadwood. I would like to inquire whether, with this additional salary, it will equalize the salary of the assayer at Deadwood with the salary of assayers at other offices?

Mr. TAWNEY. It will not only equalize it, but it is given because of the great increase in the amount of work being done at the Deadwood office.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Dayton, Ohio, post office and courthouse: For commencement of building, under present limit, $25,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. My purpose is to ascertain some information as to this provision. I observe there is nothing referred to in the hearings concerning the appropriation for the Dayton, Ohio, post office. I understand this appropriation was authorized in the last public-buildings bill. Is this an exceptional case, where we are going to provide for the erection of a public building?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not an exceptional case.

Mr. KEIFER. It is to go on with the work.

Mr. TAWNEY. This would have gone into the sundry civil bill when the estimates were sent up if it had been included. A supplemental estimate was sent, but it came too late to have it go into the bill as it was reported to the House. It is authorized by law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; it was authorized in the general public-building bill, as I recall it, of last year.

Mr. TAWNEY. Of 1908.

Mr. STAFFORD. There was some provision in the last sundry civil appropriation bill relating to the post office at Dayton, Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. That is right; but that was supplemental to the other.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not recall. I am very sorry that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] is not present, so that he could explain the necessity for it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio told me that he would be compelled to be temporarily absent this evening and requested me to look after this matter for him to the best of my ability. I have had several conversations with with him about it and he assures me that it is needed, that it is absolutely essential, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Heating apparatus for public buildings: To pay the balance due the Chisholm Co., under its contract dated February 1, 1908, for heating apparatus supplied for the post office and courthouse at Trenton, N. J., $1,676.55.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee wherein this item differs from a claim against the Government.

Mr. TAWNEY. What page?

Mr. STAFFORD. Page 11, lines 8 and 13, inclusive.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, this is an item where the appropriation that was made for the building lapsed before the contract was completed. This is merely to carry out the contract obligation of the Government with a man who had the contract for the construction of the building.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then there is no additional appropriation and it is within the limit of the original appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, but the appropriation has lapsed.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the following appropriation is in the same condition?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; absolutely.

Mr. DAWSON. Some complications arose in the construction of the building which delayed the installation of the heating apparatus until after the appropriation had lapsed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To defray the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, being additional to the permanent appropriation for this purpose, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, $500,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. How much is the permanent appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. TAWNEY. The permanent appropriation is $5,500,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Why is it necessary to increase the amount provided?

Mr. TAWNEY. Because the amount is not sufficient to pay the expenses of collecting the customs.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. What percentage of the customs revenue does it take to collect those customs?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not state accurately now, but my recollection is, though, that it costs about $3 per thousand.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Has that percentage for the last few years been increasing or diminishing?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think it has been, on the whole, diminishing. Of course, much of this cost is due to the fact that we are maintaining some forty-odd customs offices in districts where the amount of money collected is much less than the cost of maintaining those customs districts and offices.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Why do not you discontinue them?

Mr. TAWNEY. Because we can not do it; we have not got the votes; we have tried a number of times.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Take one at a time and you can do it.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what we are trying to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 3687 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is repealed, to take effect from and after June 30, 1912; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall, for the fiscal year 1913, and annually thereafter, submit to Congress, in the regular Book of Estimates, detailed estimates of expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph commencing on line 19 and ending on line 25.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina that there is an illustration of the difficulty of repealing a permanent appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to obtain by purchase or to cause to be printed blank forms of clearances, manifests, and other forms used in connection with the transaction of customs business, and to sell such forms at ports and subports of entry, ports of delivery, and elsewhere, at a uniform price of 5 cents each, and under regulations to be prescribed by him. All moneys received from the sale of such forms shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury in the same manner as other moneys collected by customs officers.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the Chairman will permit me, I just want to say one word as to the reason for the committee making this recommendation. At present the blank forms referred to in this paragraph are furnished by the Government to the collector and sold by the collector to the shipper at 10 cents apiece. It is a species of private graft on the part of the customs collector, and it is proposed now merely to charge about what it costs to provide the forms printed and give the forms to those who desire and need them in the transaction of their business at one-half the cost they are now paying the collector.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to hear the chairman of the committee make a statement as to private graft——

Mr. TAWNEY. That statement is made on the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. McMORRAN. I do not care who it is made by; whoever makes that is not familiar with the facts.

The facts are, Mr. Chairman, that for a number of years past not only in Detroit, but in Port Huron, Mich., the Grand Trunk Railroad, the Pere Marquette Railroad, and the Michigan Central Railroad have been furnishing their own blanks at a cost of about 1 cent apiece. That is the actual cost. It is true that the customs collectors at Port Huron, where nobody sees fit to furnish his own blanks, charge 10 cents apiece for the blanks. As I understand, that sum of 10 cents goes to the collector as part of his compensation.

Now, I am interested in a local company at Port Huron, my home town, where we have considerable to do with the collector of customs, and we are permitted to furnish our own blanks, costing about 1 cent apiece. The effect of this paragraph would be to create a trust in the Treasury Department, enabling it to hold up the business interests of this country and compelling them to pay 500 per cent actual premium on the business they do with the collector of customs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 2648 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph. Since the other paragraph went out, this one also must be eliminated.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a point of order against the paragraph?

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve it. I ask the chairman if it is necessary to eliminate it? I have nothing at interest in the matter.

Mr. TAWNEY. The previous paragraphs have gone out; and, of course, if we do not repeal that section, the permanent appropriation stands.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To refund to the Albert Champion Co., of Boston, Mass., duties erroneously collected from them, as reported by the collector of customs at that port, and covered into the Treasury, $2,272.48.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph just read.

Mr. TAWNEY. The point of order will not lie, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota will be heard on that paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. The law authorizes the refund of this duty. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER] is perfectly cognizant of the facts. That is expressly authorized by the statute.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Wisconsin will not press his point of order. I have not the documents at hand at this moment, but I can assure him that this money was collected in excess of the duties prescribed by law. The Treasury Department admits that an error was made in classifying these goods which caused the Albert Champion Co. to pay into the Treasury $2,272.48 more than it rightfully should, and the Treasury Department acknowledges the justice of the claim involved in this proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. Wherein does this paragraph differ from a claim against the Government?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the reason this provision becomes necessary is because the protest against the classification or rate of duty was not made within the time fixed or limited by law. Had they filed their protest earlier, had their protest been prosecuted to a final conclusion, resulting in their favor, they would then be entitled to the refund of this money, but the failure on their part to come within the time fixed for the filing of the protest is the only reason, as the Secretary of the Treasury says, why the Treasury authorities are not at liberty now to pay the money out of the Treasury and out of the appropriation that is made for that purpose. That is all there is in it. They did not get there quite in time. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin insist upon the point of order?

Mr. KELIHER. I will say further, in answer to the query of the gentleman on my right [Mr. STAFFORD], that this claim differs from claims that might appear to be of a similar nature, in that there was considerable controversy over the particular paragraph of the Dingley Act under which these goods should have been classified. That question is settled, as the letter I hold here in my hand, which I shall read—a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in which is set forth by that official an acknowledgment that these duties were in excess of law and the correctness of the amount this item provides refunding. Here is what the Secretary of the Treasury states:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 21, 1911.

THE CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th instant, in which you state that there is pending before the subcommittee which is considering the sundry civil appropriation bill an item for the payment of $2,285.83 excess duties claimed to have been paid by the Albert Champion Co., of Boston, Mass., upon certain automobile ignition wires imported through that port.

In reply to your inquiry whether this department has any objections to your committee carrying an item in the sundry civil appropriation bill for the refund of the excess duties collected, I have to advise you that the department has no objection if Congress desires to grant the company relief.

I will state, however, that the amount should be changed to $2,272.48, to agree with a report received from the collector of customs at Boston under date of January 30, 1911.

Respectfully, FRANKLIN MACVEAGH, Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, for several years this company paid excessive duties through no fault of their own, but rather because of an error of the customs officials. This obviously imposed a handicap upon them in competing with their business rivals. The sum involved is only a couple of thousand dollars, and I trust the gentleman will not split hairs, and will withdraw his point of order, and allow this item to pass.

Mr. STAFFORD. When I was attempting to ascertain the place in the hearings concerning this claim in the index, I found it referred to page 141, which was an erroneous reference. Since the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER] has called to my attention the correct paging, in which it is clearly shown that the Secretary of the Treasury recommends this claim and the amount, I therefore withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Relief of Phoebe Clark: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of "An act for the relief of Phoebe Clark," approved February 16, 1911, $116.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph at the end of line 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, after line 17, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Relief of the State of Oregon: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the State of Oregon for expenditures made by said State at the request of the authorities of the United States during the Civil War in the enlistment of soldiers mustered into the service of the United States, and there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $193,543.02, this sum being the amount determined upon by the Court of Claims in a finding of fact printed in Senate Document No. 28, Sixty-first Congress, first session."

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. I wish to state that it is not in order in this part of the bill, if in order at all. It belongs to the War Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] suggest where it might possibly be in order?

Mr. KEIFER. If it is in order at all, it must come under the head of the War Department later on in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. On what page?

Mr. KEIFER. On page 27. It is under the head of the "Secretary of War," which is under the head of "Military Establishment." We are now under the "Treasury Department" and that portion of the bill, and certainly the amendment would not be germane there.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be no mistake and the proposition may not be raised upon the germaneness of the amendment alone, I make the point of order that it is legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is hardly germane to this portion of the bill without passing further.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the point of order better be made now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, on the ground that it is not germane to this part of the bill.

The Clerk will read.

For amount required to make monthly payments to John S. Kissinger, late of Company D, One hundred and fifty-seventh Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and also late of Hospital Corps, United States Army, from February 15, 1911, to June 30, 1912, inclusive, as authorized by the act approved February 15, 1911, $1,653.33.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to change the initial letter "S" in the name of John S. Kissinger, in line 6, to the initial letter "R," so that it will read "John R. Kissinger."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to modify the paragraph as indicated by him.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman know the name?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; it is my bill.

Mr. KEIFER. We agree to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana whether in the law granting relief to Mr. Kissinger it is "John S." or "John R.?"

Mr. BARNHART. It is "John R."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the paragraph will be so modified.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment to Wesley A. Stuart, attorney, Sturgis, S. Dak., for defending First Lieut. David H. Biddle in suit brought against that officer for causing a herd of horses to be ejected from the military reservation at Fort Meade, S. Dak., $50.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer again the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, after line 23, insert as a new paragraph:

"Relief of the State of Oregon: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the State of Oregon for expenditures made by said State, at the request of the authorities of the United States, during the Civil War, in the enlistment of soldiers mustered into the service of the United States; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $193,543.02, this sum being the amount determined upon by the Court of Claims in a finding of fact printed in Senate Document No. 28, Sixty-first Congress, first session."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] on the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This claim is exactly similar to the so-called Texas claim, which has been heretofore decided. It is not authorized by law. The law under which the claim was examined did not in any way provide a foundation upon which it would be in order in an appropriation bill. I think the Chair has a decision on the Texas claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has a decision on the Texas claim. Does the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HAWLEY. This claim was submitted to the Court of Claims by the Senate of the United States, and the amount specified in the amendment I offer is the amount stated by that court in the finding of fact.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Oregon inform the Chair if it is a judgment?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not a judgment; it is a finding of fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Oregon further, if he desires to be heard.

Mr. HAWLEY. At the beginning of the war Secretary Seward wrote to the governor of Oregon, saying:

The President has directed me to invite your attention to the subject of the importance of perfecting the defenses of the State of Oregon, over which you preside, and ask you to submit the subject to the consideration of the legislature when it shall have assembled. Such proceedings by the State would require only a temporary use of its means. The expenditures ought to be made the subject of conference with the Federal Government. If they are thus made, with the concurrence of the Government, for the general defense, there is every reason to believe that Congress would sanction what the State should do and would provide for its reimbursement.

Many other communications similar to this are on file in the War Department and printed in the records of the Civil War issued by the Government.

At the instance of the Secretary of War, and through the Secretary of State and the President of the United States, the State of Oregon did exactly what the United States authorities desired it to do, and passed a law providing a bonus of $150 for every soldier who should thereafter enlist in the service of the United States.

A number of soldiers so enlisted, forming a regiment of cavalry and another of infantry, which were mustered into the service of the United States, and served not only in Oregon, but in Idaho and Washington, protecting settlers from the ravages of Indians, defending the overland mails, and defending also the immigrants into the Northwest.

As I said in the beginning, this claim was submitted to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact, and the decision of the court in the finding of fact was that the State had expended this amount of money specified in my proposed amendment, for the purpose stated, and it was done under the request and urgent entreaty and representation of the military authorities of the United States, with President Lincoln at the head.

Mr. KEIFER. Does this entire sum, thus found, arise from paying bounties to soldiers?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. The Government of the United States paid the other expenses, did it not, long ago?

Mr. HAWLEY. It paid other expenses.

Mr. KEIFER. This is confined to the payment of bounty. Why was not the claim presented many years ago?

Mr. HAWLEY. The State of Oregon issued bonds to pay the soldiers who enlisted after the passage of the act, and as soon as the bonds so issued had matured, so that the State had a matured claim, that claim was presented, but like many other claims, the payment has been delayed.

Mr. KEIFER. Do I understand that the State of Oregon issued bonds to pay $100 to each soldier?

Mr. HAWLEY. One hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. KEIFER. One hundred and fifty dollars to each one of these soldiers, as a bounty for his enlistment in the United States service?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. I am under the impression that almost all of the Northern States issued such veteran bounties, as they were called, usually $100, and that no claim was ever presented by the States to the Government for that bounty.

Mr. HAWLEY. In 21 deficiency bills, so far as my investigation has run, a very large number of claims of States have been paid, amounting to many millions of dollars.

Mr. KEIFER. That I agree to, but was the money paid on account of a bounty that was given by a statute passed after the Civil War? In Ohio we paid a great many thousands of dollars on statutes enacted as late as 1867-68, and I think there was never any claim presented to the Government for them.

Mr. DAWSON. Is it not true that these bonds were issued for the purpose of inducing men to enlist as soldiers to repel the Indian invasion, that they were not troops to put down the Civil War at all, but were bonds issued after their service expired, and was in the nature of a bounty which Congress has never gone into heretofore.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bonds were only for reenlistments or volunteers after the passage of the act. The troops were enlisted by the State and were engaged to put down Indian insurrections, and for the other purposes already mentioned, but they were generally veteran soldiers, whose terms of service were expiring. But the conditions were such that these men could not be induced to enlist with the amount that the Government was offering and the Federal Government, through telegrams and letters which I present and many others that could be presented, urged the State to pass this act granting them $150 bounty to induce men to reenlist, which was done. Men reenlisted as volunteer soldiers and served in the State of Oregon and the Territories of Idaho and Washington for some time, and I believe they served more outside of Oregon than they did in Oregon, and the bounty was paid to those who enlisted after the passage of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. One more question. When was the act passed granting this $150 bounty?

Mr. HAWLEY. In 1864.

The following is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the claim, made under a provision in the last annual general deficiency act:

[House Document No. 1265, Sixty-first Congress, third session.]

CLAIM OF THE STATE OF OREGON.

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report on the claim of the State of Oregon for equipment of volunteer troops:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 5, 1911.

SIR: I beg to submit my report pursuant to the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910 (35 Stat., 777), authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to reopen, adjust, and audit the claims of the State of Oregon for expenses incurred in raising, supplying, and equipping its volunteer troops during the period of the Civil War, and to ascertain and report to Congress for consideration what sums, if any, were expended by the said State and have not been reimbursed to it by the United States on account of the principal of bonds issued, interest paid thereon, the expenses of advertising and printing in connection therewith, in providing means for the payment of bounty to volunteers mustered into the service of the United States and who were engaged in the State of Oregon and adjacent Territories in the suppression of Indian outbreaks.

It is found upon examination that the State of Oregon actually expended $193,929.82 in accordance with said laws in the redemption of bounty lands, interest thereon, and expenses connected therewith, as follows:

Paid for redemption of 2,719 bonds of the par value of $50 each (part redeemed below par)	$128,991.02
Interest on said bonds	64,344.20
Printing bonds, warrants, bond books, and bounty certificates	113.00
Advertising in newspapers for redemption of bonds prior to maturity	481.60
Total	193,929.82

Senate Document No. 28, Sixty-first Congress, first session, presents very clearly the nature and basis of the claim:

[Senate Document No. 28, Sixty-first Congress, first session.]

MAINTAINING STATE MILITIA DURING THE CIVIL WAR.

COURT OF CLAIMS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 30, 1909.

SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court I transmit herewith a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the aforesaid cause, which case was referred to this court by the resolution of the United States Senate, under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act.

I am, very respectfully, yours, JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
President of the Senate.

[Court of Claims of the United States. Congressional, No. 13852. The State of Oregon v. The United States.]

STATEMENT OF CASE.

This is a claim for money alleged to have been expended by the State of Oregon in recruiting and paying bounty to State volunteers in the United States service, and for recruiting, equipping, and maintaining State militia during the Civil War. The claim was presented to the War Department and disallowed because the department had no jurisdiction to consider claims of this nature. It was then presented to the Treasury Department in 1884 under the act of June 27, 1882 (22 Stat. L., 111). It was disallowed by the Third Auditor on March 10, 1888, on the ground that the act of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat. L., 276), made no provision to pay expenses of raising troops for State purposes and not called into service by the request or authority of the Secretary of War or the President.

On May 29, 1908, the United States Senate, by resolution, referred to the court, under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act, a bill in the following words:

[S. 2951, Sixtieth Congress, second session.]

"A bill for the relief of the State of Oregon.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $358,235.61 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the State of Oregon, in full settlement of its claim for raising, supplying, and equipping its volunteer troops and militia during the years 1861 to 1865, inclusive."

The claimants appeared and filed their petition in this court July 11, 1908, in which they make substantially the following allegations:

"That on the 14th day of October, 1861, the Chief Executive, acting through the agency of the Hon. William H. Seward, Secretary of State of the United States, addressed to the governor of the State of Oregon a letter, a copy of which is hereunto annexed, marked 'Claimant's Exhibit No. 3,' wherein attention was called to the necessity for the authorities of said State to place the same in a state of defense; to the fact that in previous wars the several States had independently and by separate activity supported and aided the Federal Government in its responsibilities, and that 'in view of this fact, and relying upon the increase and continuance of the same disposition on the part of the loyal States, the President has directed me to invite your consideration of the subject of the importance of perfecting the defenses of the State over which you preside, and ask you to submit the subject to the consideration of the legislature when it shall have assembled. Such proceedings by the State would require only a temporary use of its means. The expenditures ought to be made the subject of conference with the Federal Government. Being thus made with the concurrence of the Government for general defense, there is every reason to believe that Congress would sanction what the State should do, and would provide for its reimbursement.'"

That in the month of October, 1861, by authority of the War Department, a call was made for the raising of a regiment of cavalry in the State of Oregon, to be mustered into the service of the United States for a term of three years. Six companies of said regiment were raised during the winter of 1861 and 1862, when, by order of the War Department, it was directed that recruiting should cease. On January 5, 1863, a requisition was made upon the governor of said State for the raising of additional companies to fill the regiment. On account of the conditions then existing in that country, as hereinafter more fully set forth, and the inadequacy of the pay of such troops under the Federal laws then existing, it was found impossible to secure recruits to fill more than one company. One company was, however, raised and mustered into the service of the United States, under the command of Capt. H. C. Small.

That, commencing with the act of September 28, 1850 (9 Stat. L., 504), Congress had provided certain extra pay to the officers and enlisted men of the United States Army serving or enrolled in Oregon and California in recognition of the difference in the conditions existing in that section of the country. By said act of September 28, 1850, it was provided that there should be allowed to each commissioned officer while serving in said States, in addition to their regular pay and allowances, a per diem of $2 each, and to each enlisted man a per diem, in addition to their regular pay and allowances, equal to the pay proper of each as established by existing laws, said extra pay to be retained until said enlisted men were honorably discharged. By the act of Congress of August 31, 1852, said appropriation was continued, but the amount of extra pay to be paid enlisted men was reduced to one-half; these appropriations were not continued during the Civil War, and there were no troops of the Regular Army within the State of Oregon after the summer of 1861.

By the act of Congress of June 17, 1850 (9 Stat. L., 438), the President was authorized to enroll privates by volunteer enlistment in regiments of the Regular Army serving at the several military posts on the western frontier, and it was directed that whenever such enlistments were made at these posts a bounty equal to the cost of transporting and subsisting a soldier from the principal recruiting depot in the harbor of New York to the place of such enlistment should be allowed each recruit so enlisted. The amount so paid these recruits exceeded $150 per man. This provision was repealed by the act of August 3, 1861 (12 Stat. L., 288), although at the time of such repeal the conditions which had theretofore existed still obtained.

In the act of Congress authorizing the President to accept volunteers from the governors of the several States (act of July 22, 1861, 12 Stat. L., 268) and in the act of July 27, 1861, directing the refund to the governors of such States for expenses properly incurred for recruiting, etc., there was no restriction imposed as to the character or amount of such proper expenditures to be incurred or reimbursed.

No troops were raised or recruited by the Federal authorities in the State of Oregon during the Civil War. The pay provided by Congress for volunteers, $13 per month, was paid to the Oregon volunteers in legal-tender notes, notwithstanding that in Oregon and in the other Pacific coast States and Territories gold was maintained as to the standard of value, and such notes had in that section of the United States a commercial value of less than half of their face value. The wages of ordinary laborers in the State of Oregon at that time ranged from $2 to $5 per day, and the cost of living and the prices of all commercial commodities was correspondingly high, so that it became and was impossible for the State authorities to furnish volunteers for service without offering certain premiums or inducements as a consideration for enlistment, and after consultation and conference with the Federal officers in charge of the military department of the Pacific, said State, acting through its governor and legislature, and at the urgent solicitation of said Federal officials, agreed to pay and did pay certain considerations for enlistment, as set forth in the succeeding paragraphs of this petition.

On the 5th day of October, 1864, the governor of the State of Oregon addressed a communication to the general commanding the district of Oregon, Brig. Gen. Benjamin Alvord, stating that the question of passing a law giving bounty for recruits was under consideration, but the fact that when they consider that it will run the State in debt $150,000 to raise 1,000 men seems to make the legislature hesitate, and that "if a call is made for more men, I hope it will be made before the adjournment, so that the question will be fairly presented." In reply thereto Gen. Alvord, on October 18, 1865, addressed a letter to the governor of Oregon, wherein he states:

"I feel that it is very important for the public service, as I have continually represented to you for a long time, that the legislature of Oregon should pass a law giving bounty to volunteers."

On October 20, 1864, the legislature having meanwhile done nothing in the execution of these suggestions, Maj. Gen. Irwin McDowell, commanding the Department of the Pacific at San Francisco, Cal., telegraphed to the governor of Oregon that orders had been received from the War Department that a regiment of infantry be raised in the State of Oregon as soon as possible.

Upon the receipt by the governor of Oregon of this call he acknowledged the receipt thereof as follows:

"Your telegram requesting a regiment of infantry has just been received.

"I will do all in my power to raise it, but fear I may not have as good success as desired. I recommend the legislature now in session to offer bounties, but now it is but one day to the time of adjournment, and I regret to say that I fear a bill introduced for that purpose will not pass."

On the same day said governor advised the general commanding the district of Oregon, Brig. Gen. Alvord, of the receipt of the call for the regiment of infantry, stating that although there has not been a general disposition in the legislature to offer bounties, the making of this call will, he thinks, occasion the passing of the bill. Upon the receipt by the general commanding the department, Maj. Gen. Irwin McDowell, of the letter of the governor of Oregon of October 20, 1864, above quoted, said general telegraphed to the governor of Oregon urging the passage of said bounty law, and in response to this telegram said governor, on October 28, 1864, addressed to Gen. McDowell the following communication:

"STATE OF OREGON, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
"Salem, October 28, 1864.

"GENERAL: Your telegram was duly received. I sent to the legislative assembly the inclosed message, and a law has been passed giving a bounty of $150 to each volunteer. Your telegram just in time. Without it the bounty bill would not have passed. I have the honor to be,

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"ADDISON C. GIBBS.

"Maj. Gen. IRWIN MCDOWELL,
"Commanding Department of the Pacific."

Your petitioner further states that, under stress of the foregoing facts, the Legislature of Oregon, on October 24, 1864, passed two acts, granting in the first what was termed "extra pay," but which was in reality an amount equal to the difference between the value of coin and that of the currency paid to troops serving in the United States Army as volunteers from the State of Oregon, the gold standard being then maintained on the Pacific coast and currency being depreciated approximately 50 per cent, and the second, a bounty of $150 to each recruit thereafter voluntarily enlisting.

There being at the time no available funds for the payment of such extra pay and bounty, it was provided in said acts that, to carry out their provisions, bonds of the State should be issued, and by section 6 of the first-named act it was provided that bonds to the amount of $100,000 should be issued, redeemable on the 1st day of July, 1875, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from the date of their issue, payable semiannually, coupons for such interest to be attached to each bond. By section 8 of the second-named act it was provided that similar bonds bearing the same rate of interest should be issued, redeemable on the 1st day of July, 1884.

By another act, passed October 24, 1864, a copy of which is hereunto annexed, marked "Claimant's Exhibit No. 9," an appropriation of $1,000 was made to pay the expenses of engraving and printing in connection with the two acts above named.

On account of the inducements offered by the acts granting extra pay and bounty, as above set forth, the officers of said State were enabled to promptly and efficiently comply with said third call for the raising of a regiment of infantry, made, as above stated, on the 20th day of October, 1864, and did raise said regiment, which was thereafter mustered into the military service of the United States, and it served for the common defense of the United States until it was mustered out of service by companies at different dates from October 31, 1865, to July 19, 1867; and also, on account of such inducements offered for service in the United States Volunteer Army, said First Regiment of Oregon Volunteer Cavalry, recruited under the calls of October, 1861, and January, 1863, was continued in such service after the expiration of the original terms of service of its veteran volunteers, and, with recruits, continued in the military service of the United States until mustered out by companies at different dates from May 26, 1866, to November 20, 1866.

Your petitioner further states that the difficulties of recruiting troops to serve upon the established rates of Army pay, after the repeal of the provisions of the acts of 1850 and 1851, was fully represented to and recognized by the military authorities of the United States commanding in that country, and was by the general commanding the department duly reported to the War Department; that on November 20, 1863, the general commanding advised the War Department that in the execution of the varied duties and responsibilities in that remote department it had frequently been necessary for him to act promptly and assume responsibilities which in time of peace he would have deferred for the action of the General in Chief and War Department; that he has done and will thereafter do what seems to be his duty, acknowledging his responsibility to the General in Chief, the Secretary of War, and the President, in the concluding paragraph of his letter to the Missouri delegation of October 5, and that he requests of the Secretary of War an approval of all done by him in the matter of raising and organizing volunteer organizations in that department, necessary in view of the fact that objections may be made by the accounting officers in cases where the regulations of the department have not been followed. Inclosed in this communication he forwarded a copy of his General Orders, No. 40, modifying the general orders relative to recruiting by transferring to the governors of the States and Territories the control exercised by commissaries of musters and superintendents of recruiting service.

Your petitioner further states that the passage of these acts granting extra pay were reported to the Secretary of War by the military authorities of said Department of the Pacific, and that the troops so recruited were called for and accepted with the knowledge of the conditions under which said States were required and did secure their enrollment.

The value to the United States of said bounty law in the State of Oregon and the interest of the military authorities of the United States therein is further shown by the following letter of the general commanding the district of Oregon:

HEADQUARTERS, DISTRICT OF OREGON,
Vancouver, Wash., January 10, 1865.

SIR: I learn from Col. Maury on his return from Portland that the idea is entertained by some persons that the act of the Oregon Legislature of 24th October, 1864, providing for payment of $150 bounty "to every soldier who shall hereafter enlist for three years or during the war in any regiment, battalion, or company now organized or hereafter to be organized or raised as part of the quota of volunteers of this State, etc.," was not intended by the members of the Oregon Legislature for any but the First Oregon Infantry.

I desire to say that this must be a mistake, as at the first of the session I saw that a bill had been introduced by Mr. Donnell providing for bounties only to the Oregon Cavalry. I instantly wrote to Mr. Donnell begging him to modify the language of the bill so as to apply to any troops which might be called for, as no one then knew what kind of troops would be called for. The bill passed so as clearly to include either Cavalry or Infantry.

It is essential in the new effort to raise the Oregon Cavalry that the same bounties shall be promised as have been promised the Oregon Infantry. The law clearly and unmistakably provides for them.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. ALVORD,
Brigadier General, U. S. Volunteers, Commanding District.

His Excellency A. C. GIBBS,
Governor of Oregon, Portland, Oreg.

That under said act of October 24, 1864, granting extra pay to the Oregon volunteers in the service of the United States, there was expended by your petitioner the sum of $90,392.99, the bonds to raise funds for payment to the amount thereof being issued on January 2, 1865, and during the period while said bonds were outstanding and unpaid, and until the maturity thereof, said State was required to pay and did pay interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, amounting to the sum of $44,745.20, making the total expenditure of said State for extra pay under said act the sum of $135,138.19, as will more particularly appear by reference to the vouchers thereof filed in this case under the title of "Abstract K."

Under said act of October 24, 1864, providing for the payment of bounty to volunteers thereafter enlisting, said State paid to such volunteers the sum of $129,041.02, and, having no available funds to meet said expenditure, did, on January 2, 1865, issue bonds bearing interest at 7 per cent per annum, as therein provided, and did actually pay thereon, as interest, the sum of $62,466.45, making a total expenditure of said State on this account of the sum of $191,507.47, as will more fully appear by reference to the vouchers thereof filed in this cause under the title of "Abstract H."

And your petitioner further incurred and paid certain expenses in connection with the office of the adjutant general and the service and the expenses of recruiting officers amounting to the sum of $9,731.33, as will more fully appear by reference to the vouchers thereof filed in this case under the title of "Abstract —."

Your petitioner necessarily incurred and paid certain expenses of the adjutant general's office in connection with the recruiting of said troops for postal expenses, amounting to the sum of $121.72, vouchers for which have been filed in this case under the title of "Abstract F."

And your petitioner further paid certain expenses for services of said adjutant general's office for clerk hire and miscellaneous items, amounting to the sum of $805.66, as will more fully appear by reference to the vouchers filed under the title of "Abstract E."

And your petitioner further paid certain expenses for services rendered by various parties for supplies, printing, services, etc., amounting to the sum of $2,276.63, as will more fully appear by reference to the vouchers filed under the title of "Abstract D."

And your petitioner further states that it paid certain expenses of transportation, amounting to $724.42, as will more fully appear by reference to vouchers filed under the title of "Abstract C."

And your petitioner further states that it paid certain expenses for miscellaneous supplies, such as arms, ammunition, and camp equipage, forage, stationery, etc., amounting to the sum of $3,998.46, as will more fully appear by reference to vouchers filed under the title of "Abstract B."

Your petitioner further states that it was during the years 1863 and 1864 called upon at various times for volunteers for temporary service for periods of a few months, and that troops were mustered into such temporary service, occasioning a part of the expenses hereinbefore set forth; that in order to be in readiness to meet such calls, acting with the full knowledge of the military officers appointed by the War Department and the commander of said military district and in the spirit of the letter of the Hon. William H. Seward to the governor of the State above referred to, it made certain provisions for a State militia, and in order to render such militia efficient it was necessary that the same be assembled at various times, and on this account the petitioner paid during the years 1863, 1864, and 1865 the sum of $9,907; that said militia was not as such mustered into service of the United States, but its organization and efficient condition was occasioned and maintained in order to comply with the request of the honorable Secretary of State, as above set forth, and was reasonable and necessary to that purpose.

Your petitioner further states that it has been guilty of no laches or delay in the preparation or presentation of this claim, but that it duly presented the same to the Treasury Department and to the War Department; that said claim was disallowed by the War Department because said department had no jurisdiction over claims of this nature, and it was disallowed by the Treasury Department for the reason that under the construction of the acts of Congress adopted by that department such expenses could not be allowed.

Your petitioner further states that by an act of Congress approved July 27, 1861, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to reimburse the States for the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred in enrolling, paying, etc., troops raised for service during the Civil War, and that under the liberal construction of said act which the Supreme Court of the United States (160 U. S., 598) has decided should be applied, the foregoing disbursements of the State of Oregon should have been allowed and paid, in that they were necessary to accomplish the raising of troops for the common defense.

The case was brought to a hearing on loyalty and merits on the 27th day of November, A. D. 1908.

Messrs. Ralston & Siddons and W. E. Richardson, Esq., appeared for the claimant, and the Attorney General, by Clark McKercher, Esq., his assistant, appeared for the protection and defense of the interests of the United States.

The court, upon the evidence adduced and after considering the arguments and briefs of counsel on both sides, makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT.

I. In the early part of the Civil War the Federal troops in the State of Oregon were withdrawn for service in the East, rendering it necessary for the State authorities to raise troops for the protection and defense of the State and its citizens and the residents of adjoining Territories. Under various calls made by the War Department, the State raised seven companies of cavalry and one regiment of infantry during said war, as hereinafter set forth, numbering in all about 1,810 men, which were mustered into the United States service and were engaged during the war and until the close of the year 1866 in operations against hostile Indians.

II. In the winter of 1861–62 private citizens of Oregon, pursuant to calls made by the United States military authorities of the Pacific coast, raised six companies of cavalry, thereafter known as the "First Oregon Cavalry," which were mustered into the United States service for the term of three years. On January 5, 1863, to meet the then existing demand for troops, a further call was made on the governor of Oregon for the raising of six additional companies to complete the regiment of First Oregon Cavalry. Efforts were made by the State authorities, assisted by United States officers, to raise these troops, and up to August 10, 1863, they had been successful in raising but one company. The terms of enlistment of many of these men would expire in 1864, and on October 24 of that year the legislature of the State of Oregon passed an act entitled "An act for the relief of the commissioned officers and enlisted men of the Oregon volunteers in the service of the United States," granting to every Oregon volunteer then in the service of the United States extra pay to the amount of $5 per month from date of enlistment to date of discharge. Said act provided for the issuance of bonds to the amount of $100,000, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum. In the redemption of these bonds the State expended for principal and interest the sum of $135,279.72, and for advertising for the redemption of the bonds before maturity the sum of $354.10, making a total of $135,633.82.

The amounts so expended under said soldiers' relief act were paid to volunteers whose terms of service had expired or were about to expire. The payment of same was a gratuity on the part of the State and was granted without any authority from the United States, and the State of Oregon has no claim, legal or equitable, against the United States on account of the expenses so incurred.

III. On October 20, 1864, Maj. Gen. McDowell, commanding the Department of the Pacific, telegraphed the governor of Oregon that orders had been received by him from the War Department that a regiment of infantry be raised in the State of Oregon as soon as possible. Upon receipt of said telegram the governor wrote Gen. McDowell, as follows:

"Your telegram requesting a regiment of infantry has just been received. I will do all in my power to raise it, but I fear I may not have as good success as desired. I recommend the legislature now in session to offer bounties, but now it is but one day to the time of adjournment, and I regret to say that I fear a bill introduced for that purpose will not pass."

The conditions then existing in that State on account of the high rate of wages, the cost of living, the inadequacy of the pay of United States troops, and the depreciation of legal-tender notes in which they were paid, as provided by law, made it impossible for the State authorities to secure volunteers for the military service without offering premiums or inducements as a consideration for enlistment.

Brig. Gen. Alvord, commanding the district of Oregon, in a communication to the governor of the State, dated October 18, 1864, which was transmitted to the legislature in a special message by the governor, stated that he felt it important for the public service, as he had continually represented to the governor, that the legislature of Oregon should pass a law giving bounty to volunteers; that the inadequacy of the pay was especially evident on the Pacific coast, where the depreciation of legal-tender notes was discouraging to volunteering. It also appears that immediately after the bounty act of October 24, 1864, hereinafter referred to, was passed, the governor of Oregon, Addison C. Gibbs, sent the following communication to Maj. Gen. Irwin McDowell:

STATE OF OREGON, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Salem, October 28, 1864.

GENERAL: Your telegram was duly received. I sent to the legislative assembly the inclosed message, and a law has been passed giving a bounty of $150 to each volunteer. Your telegram just in time. Without it the bounty bill would not have passed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ADDISON C. GIBBS.

Maj. Gen. IRWIN MCDOWELL,
Commanding Department of the Pacific.

On October 20, 1864, the governor sent a special message to the legislature of the State, informing it of the call made by the War Department for a regiment of infantry and quoting from Gen. Alvord's letter, above referred to, recommending the passage of a law granting bounty to volunteers.

Thereupon the legislature of the State, acting upon the suggestion of Gen. Alvord, passed an act approved October 24, 1864, granting a bounty of $150 to every soldier who should thereafter enlist for three years or during the war in any regiment, company, or troop, then or thereafter to be organized, and by said act appropriated and set aside a fund of $200,000, called the soldiers' bounty fund, for paying said bounties.

The State at the time was without available funds for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of said act, and to provide for the fund thereby created authorized the issuance of bonds, redeemable July 1, 1884, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from the date of issue. Thereafter the State raised one regiment of infantry, known as the First Oregon Infantry, which was mustered into the service of the United States for three years, and recruited all the companies of the First Oregon Cavalry whose terms of enlistment had expired.

In the raising of said regiment of infantry the State issued to soldiers enlisting after the passage of said act 2,760 bonds of the State of the par value of $50 each, and in the redemption of said bonds it necessarily and properly expended the following amounts: For principal, the sum of $129,041.02; for interest thereon the sum of $63,868; and for advertising for the redemption of bonds before maturity the sum of $481. The State also expended in connection with the raising of said troops and the payment of bounty under said act the sum of $153 for printing said bounty bonds, warrants, commissions, bounty certificates, and bond books, making a total expenditure under said bounty act on account of bounties paid to volunteers mustered into the United States service $193,543.02, no part of which appears to have been repaid to it.

IV. The troops so organized and mustered into the United States service as aforesaid were never actually called into the service of the United States in the suppression of the War of the Rebellion, but were engaged exclusively in the State of Oregon and adjacent Territories in the suppression of Indian outbreaks.

V. At the time of the passage of the act of the Legislature of the State of Oregon of October 24, 1864, the act of July 4, 1864 (13 Stat. L., 379), granting bounty to one, two, and three year volunteers was in force and the records of the Treasury Department in the office of the Auditor for the War Department show that the enlisted men of the First Oregon Infantry were paid bounties by the United States under that act.

Said records also show that the enlisted men of the First Battalion of Cavalry, Oregon Volunteers, were paid bounties by the United States under the act of Congress of July 22, 1861 (12 Stat. L., 268, secs. 5 and 6), and orders of the War Department, series of 1863, legalized by joint resolution of January 13, 1864 (13 Stat. L., 400).

VI. The Legislature of Oregon passed an act approved October 16, 1862, provicing for an enrolled militia out of which the Organized Militia of the State should be formed. Companies were raised, equipped, and drilled, and the State expended during the years 1863 to 1865, in raising, supplying, and equipping said militia the sum of $6,323.44.

No part of said militia was ever in the military service of the United States, and the State of Oregon has no claim, legal or equitable, against the United States for expenses incurred by the State in raising, supplying, and equipping the same.

VII. This claim was first presented to the War Department and was disallowed, because that department had no jurisdiction to consider such claims. It was then presented to the Treasury Department in 1884 under the act of June 27, 1882 (22 Stat. L., 111), and was disallowed on the ground that the act of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat. L., 276), made no provision to pay the expenses of raising troops for State purposes.

Thereafter the claim was presented to the Fiftieth and subsequent Congresses, and was transmitted to the court by resolution of the United States Senate, as hereinbefore set forth.

BY THE COURT.

[SEAL.]
JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. If this was a judgment of the Court of Claims, it would be in order on a deficiency bill. The gentleman from Oregon states that it is not a judgment of the Court of Claims, but is a mere finding of fact by that court. Findings of fact filed by the Court of Claims do not authorize an appropriation on a general deficiency bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indiana Harbor, Ind.: So much as may be necessary of the unexpended balance of the appropriation heretofore made for the improvement of the harbor at Indiana Harbor, Ind., is hereby made available, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, for the maintenance of the inner harbor, in accordance with the provisions of House Document No. 1113, Sixtieth Congress, second session.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I do not find anything in the index of the hearings relating to this provision. I would like to know whether it was recommended by the Secretary of War to be included in this bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, that provision was recommended by the Secretary of War. It was put in the bill at my suggestion and was put into form by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER], chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

It involves no appropriation. The situation is this: On December 4, 1908, House Document 1113 was submitted to Congress by the Secretary of War, recommending that the Government take over the harbor at Indiana Harbor, Ind., extending from Lake Michigan to the Calumet River south, a distance of about 3 miles. The document set out the plan of the harbor in detail. At that time what is called the outer harbor, the portion lying between certain railroad and Lake Michigan, had been completed. The last river and harbor bill, approved June 25, 1910, carried an appropriation of $62,000, to be expended in accordance with House Document 1113 for improvement and maintenance of the outer harbor.

House Document 1113 recommended that the Government take over the work from the lake to Calumet River when private interests had dredged the harbor at a depth of 22 feet and 300 feet wide from the lake to the railroads and from the railroad, those located nearest the lake, down to Calumet River, 22 feet deep and 200 feet wide.

It was estimated that $62,000 would be required to improve and maintain that portion called the outer harbor.

That was in December, 1908. There was no legislation until June 25, 1910, when the river and harbor bill carried an appropriation of $62,000, and authorized the Government to take over the improvement. The document required the owners of the land to turn over to the Government, free of cost and free of all claims of whatsoever character, the harbor from Lake Michigan down to the Calumet River.

In the meantime private interests have been dredging the harbor and have completed it for a mile and a half south of the lake. There have been two large industries already located on the inner harbor and one is negotiating now, with a view to establishing a steel plant on the harbor costing upward of $5,000,000, and the question in the mind of that company is whether the Government is committed to the maintenance of the inner harbor after it is completed. The harbor has already been taken over by the Government, and the title was accepted last November. Not a dollar of the $62,000 has been expended, and the probabilities are that little, if any, will be expended until we have another river and harbor bill. The provision authorizes the use of the $62,000, or any part of it, in maintaining the inner harbor as far as completed.

The harbor is dredged, a mile and a half south of the lake, 200 feet wide and 22 feet deep, and the balance of it is dredged 100 feet wide and 22 feet deep, and the company is at work completing the dredging. Local interests did this all at their own expense at a cost of about $750,000, and it is the only harbor in that portion of northwestern Indiana that is free and open and it is being occupied by independent steel makers. There is another harbor at Gary that is owned and controlled by the United States Steel Corporation absolutely, built by the corporation and owned by it, and is under its control, and the importance of this legislation is that independent companies may locate on the channel and get the benefit of the harbor.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to inquire if the gentleman from Indiana knows the amount of the unexpended balance of the appropriation heretofore made for the improvement of the harbor?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is all unexpended.

Mr. KEIFER. How much was it originally?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Sixty-two thousand dollars, and no part of it has been expended.

Mr. MANN. This is just for maintenance.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This is for maintenance. It does not appropriate any money, but gives the Secretary of War discretion to use a portion of the appropriation in maintaining the inner harbor.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the proposition, the money was originally appropriated for outer harbor improvements.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was appropriated for improvements of the so-called outer harbor in accordance with House Document 1113.

Mr. STAFFORD. And now you wish to apply that to inner harbor development?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The House document states that the Government should maintain the harbor down as far as it was completed, and it having been completed up to the railroads at that time, it estimated that the amount appropriated was necessary for improvement and maintenance up to that point. That was the interpretation of the law made by the War Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain why this provision was not incorporated in the river and harbor act of this year?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Because nobody knew. I did not know anything about it. I supposed that the War Department had given the document the construction that it seems to me was almost forced, that the amount was available for maintenance, as far as the harbor was completed, and they have completed the harbor a mile and a half since House Document No. 1113 was filed.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire some further information. If the committee wishes the regular order, I shall insist on the point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This paragraph is of a great deal of importance to that locality and it does not cost the Government a penny.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman answer me this, whether the Chief of Engineers or the Board of Engineers that review harbor improvement estimates have ever approved of the improvement covered by this document, similar to the practice obtaining to the provisions carried in the river and harbor bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What does the gentleman mean?

Mr. MANN. They made their report, which is House Document 1113.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. All we have on the subject is a letter from the War Department stating that there is no objection to this provision, and they can only use the appropriation as far as the harbor is completed, according to the terms of House Document 1113.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the Board of Engineers approved of that likewise? The gentleman knows that to obtain an appropriation in the river and harbor act under the practice of the River and Harbor Committee it is necessary to have the favorable indorsement of the Chief of Engineers and also the Board of Engineers.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Board of Engineers approved and recommended the taking over of the improvement in the first place, upon the conditions set forth in House Document 1113.

Mr. MANN. That was their report.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That was the engineer's report, and the Secretary of War has recommended this particular item.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, it is because of the belated information called to the gentleman's attention that this matter was not incorporated in the river and harbor act of this year?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the Canadian Electric Light Co. for damages to its cable by the U. S. gunboat Essex by fouling her anchor with the company's cable between Levis and the city of Quebec, July 17, 1904, the same being in full for and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted as full and final release of the claim, $7,307.30.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph; it is nothing but a claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if there is any law authorizing this expenditure.

Mr. KEIFER. This is, as I understand it, an international matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair fails to hear the gentleman from Ohio. Does the gentleman assert that this appropriation is to carry out the provisions of a treaty?

Mr. KEIFER. That is what I understand by it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair would overrule the point of order.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, but the gentleman does not assert that that is true.

Mr. KEIFER. This is not exactly to carry out a treaty, but it is to carry out an obligation that grows out of an international matter between the two countries, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter has never been adjusted between the two Governments?

Mr. KEIFER. I think it has, but let me make this suggestion if there is any question about it. I am not very familiar with this, and I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the paragraph be passed without prejudice.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will consent to that; that is, with the point of order pending.

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Auditor for the Navy Department is directed to allow mileage to officers of the Navy who have heretofore been disallowed same by reason of a decision of the Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury, dated March 17, 1910; and to pay said allowances out of any balances of the appropriations for pay, miscellaneous, of the Navy.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. Is there any authority of law for that? I will make the point of order, then, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio on the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am not very familiar with the item, but I understand there was a different construction given by the Comptroller of the Treasury with reference to making these payments and allowance of mileage to officers of the Navy; that they have reviewed that and made those allowances to those officers in the form of mileage, and this item is to carry moneys which were disallowed by a former construction of the department.

The CHAIRMAN. Under a present construction given by the department?

Mr. KEIFER. The present construction allows it, and it is recited in the paragraph to which the point of order is made:

The Auditor for the Navy Department is directed to allow mileage to officers of the Navy who have heretofore been disallowed by reason of a decision of the Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury dated March 17, 1910——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Under the wording of the paragraph, does it mean disallowel by reason of the decision by the assistant comptroller or for the purpose of allowing it by reason of a recent decision of the comptroller?

Mr. KEIFER. No; it was formerly disallowed, and on a review in the auditor's office, Navy Department, they reversed the decision of the assistant comptroller.

Mr. MANN. Here is a decision of the assistant comptroller dated March 17, 1910, and the way the paragraph reads it would apparently mean that it was disallowed by reason of that decision. If so, it must be subsequent——

Mr. KEIFER. The allowance of mileage to the officers of the Navy Department who heretofore had their claims disallowed. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. MANN. It says:

Who has heretofore been disallowed same by reason of a decision of the Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury, dated March 17, 1910.

If they were disallowed by reason of that decision, that is one thing. If a decision of the comptroller on March 17 would allow the claim which had been previously disallowed, it might be a different situation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph authorizes the Auditor for the Navy Department to allow mileage to the officers whose claim for mileage has heretofore been disallowed under a decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury dated March 17, 1910.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman from Minnesota if that decision has been reviewed and changed or overruled?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has not, and I will say to the gentleman from Indiana—I do not know whether the facts have been explained fully or not——

Mr. MANN. They have not.

Mr. TAWNEY. The facts are these: These officers, and there are only a few of them, are naval officers who had performed sea duty for a period of three years. They had performed their full period of three years of sea duty. Under the regulations they are entitled to 30 days' leave after three years of sea duty.

They were ordered to their homes with leave for 30 days. Under the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury and the Auditor for the Navy Department, the fact that leave was granted to them in the same order, and instead of ordering them to their homes to await orders ordered them home on 30 days' leave, under the regulations and under the law, deprived them of their mileage from the station at which they were serving their sea service to their homes. If the order had been to return to their homes and await orders then they would have been entitled to the mileage and would have received it. Now, they attempted to cure the defect in the original order by writing a subsequent letter to the effect that they would be granted 30 days' leave of absence, at the expiration of which they would then receive orders for further duty. In one case there was $700 that one young officer of the Navy had received on account of mileage, and when this decision was rendered the amount which he had just received, and to which he was legally entitled, has been charged against him and is being taken out of his pay from month to month as his pay accrues, when it was no fault of the officer in any sense at all.

Mr. COX of Indiana. As I understand the gentleman's statement, the fault was more in the order than in the decision?

Mr. TAWNEY. The fault was in the order.

Mr. DAWSON. If the gentleman will pardon me, is it not true that the department has corrected this as far as it applies to the future by, instead of issuing one order, issuing two orders, and if that had been done in these instances in the past this probably would never have arisen at all?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is a hardship on the officer, who was in no sense responsible.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The explanation is satisfactory to me, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

For reimbursement to the appropriation for contingent expenses, Department of the Interior, 1911, of expenses incurred in the investigation instituted in the Patent Office to determine the validity of certain applications for patent for electric lighting, filed by one John Allen Heany, including traveling expenses, expenses of witnesses, cost of copies of testimony, and other expenses incident to the investigation, $2,500, to remain available until used.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I notice that it proposes to reimburse the appropriation for contingent expenses, and then it makes the item available until used. I take it that the unexpended balance of the appropriation for contingent expenses for the Department of the Interior would itself be covered into the Treasury at the end of two years. What is the object of making this item available until used?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that if there is an unexpended balance in the contingent appropriation it shall be turned into the Treasury at the end of two years, but this is to reimburse that appropriation for the expenses that were incurred in the Patent Office in an investigation that has been going on there for some time regarding the validity of certain patents. There have been some prosecutions already growing out of this investigation. The Commissioner of Patents was obliged to conduct it. There were no funds with which to pay the expenses, and it was necessary in the investigation to bring witnesses to Washington from some distance. The department has paid the expense out of the contingent appropriation. Now, the amount that has already been expended is something like $2,000 or $2,500, which will materially reduce this appropriation, and it is for that purpose, and that is the reason why it becomes necessary to reimburse this appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this is to reimburse a specific appropriation for contingent expenses for the year 1911.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That appropriation will not remain available after it goes back into the surplus fund of the Treasury, but this appropriation is to remain available until used, and all it could be used for would be to reimburse a fund which has already been covered into the Treasury.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman is right in that, although the commissioner requested this language, because he thought possibly the investigation would not be concluded during this fiscal year, and it was to make available for this investigation the appropriation asked, or the reimbursement asked for, beyond the end of this fiscal year. Now, if it will satisfy the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the provision that it remain available until used, I would be perfectly willing to do it.

Mr. MANN. But this appropriation will remain available without that in, as long as the other appropriation, and made available to reimburse another appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. It will remain available for expenditures on account of obligations incurred throughout the year for which the appropriation is made, and not any longer.

Mr. MANN. It is self-contradictory on its face, and for that reason it is objectionable.

Mr. TAWNEY. But if it is a matter of interest to the gentleman, I will ask that the words "to remain available until used" be stricken out of that provision. I make that motion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the words "to remain available until used." The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To complete the construction of the building for the heating, lighting, and power plant in connection with the Capitol Building and other congressional buildings, including waterway, substation equipment, cable connections between buildings, and for each and every purpose in connection with and necessary for said completion, $54,357.65, to be expended under the direction of the commission in control of the House Office Building appointed under the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 4, 1907.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph commencing on page 42 and running over on page 43. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if that commission was not changed the other day in the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; that is not the same commission. There are two House Office Building Commissions, the one in charge of construction and the other that is in charge of the building after construction. The commission originally appointed was known as the commission to construct the building. That commission is ready to report, and this particular language is put in so that there will be no question about the authority to control this appropriation. This commission can only consist of men who are Members of the House.

Mr. CULLOP. Then this is not the same commission that was referred to the other day?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. The gentleman probably has in mind the commission to reconstruct the Hall of the House.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Elliott Woods compensation for services in connection with the preparation of the plans and specifications for and superintending the construction of the House Office Building, the Capitol power plant, and subway, as authorized by the act approved March 3, 1905, $7,500.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana reserves the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want some explanation of it, and as suggested by my colleague from Illinois here [Mr. FOSTER], I would like to have some explanation as to why this second item is included.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say for the information of the gentleman from Indiana that at the close of the Fifty-seventh Congress, or at the last session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, Congress authorized the construction of the House Office Building and also the construction of the Senate Office Building, and Congress at that time created a commission to supervise and superintend the construction of both buildings and the approaches from both buildings, including the tunnels, to the Capitol, which is under the jurisdiction of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building. The aggregate expenditure authorized for the House Office Building was $3,160,548. About the same amount was appropriated for the construction of the Senate Office Building. Now if the commission, as it was authorized to do—and I hope I may have the attention of the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am listening——

Mr. TAWNEY. If the commission, as it was authorized to do, had employed an outside architect for the purpose of preparing plans and specifications and for superintending the construction of those buildings, tunnels, and so forth, in connection with and incidental to the construction of those buildings, the architect's charge would have been 6 per cent of this construction. Instead of that, however, the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds was charged with the duty and responsibility of preparing the plans and specifications and superintending the construction of these buildings, although that work was entirely outside of his statutory duties as Superintendent of the Capitol. But believing, as the commission did, that the Superintendent of the Capitol possessed the requisite ability to plan and superintend this work, they placed him in charge of it. As a matter of protection the commission authorized the Superintendent of the Capitol to employ a consulting architect. The plans and specifications for the buildings were prepared and the buildings were constructed, and if the plans and specifications had been prepared and the construction of the buildings superintended by an outside architect that outside architect would have received a fee ranging somewhere between $350,000 and $400,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I trust I may have five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman desires five minutes more. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman may proceed.

Mr. TAWNEY. These buildings were constructed under the supervision of the Superintendent of the Capitol at an expense not only within the bare limit of cost, but considerably below the limit of cost. There would have been paid for architect's fees on the House Office Building, on the basis of 5 per cent, $158,000. As it was, the supervisory and architectural work actually cost the Government the sum of $88,000, or only 2.7 per cent of the cost of the building.

Mr. COX of Indiana. To whom was that paid?

Mr. TAWNEY. A large part of that was paid to the consulting architect.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That included the plans, did it not?

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, yes; that included the office force, the preparation of the plans and specifications, and the compensation of the consulting architect.

Mr. SIMS. That included all the expense of such services as an ordinary architect would perform?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; that included all the expense that would have been incurred if an outside architect had been employed.

Mr. SIMS. Let me ask the gentleman how this amount compares with what the architect charged for remodeling the White House?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I do not think there is any comparison with the charge made by the architect who prepared the plans and specifications for remodeling the White House.

Mr. SIMS. This is so much more modest.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. There we expended $600,000, and I suppose the architect received his 5 per cent, or $30,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. As I was saying, the work actually cost the Government the sum of $88,000, or 2⅞ per cent on the cost of the building. Out of this the sum of $31,703.95 was paid for the services of a consulting architect, and a further sum of $11,000 for special engineering services, which ordinarily the client has to pay. The total net saving to the Government on architectual cost alone on this building has actually been $70,027.44.

I have a similar statement with regard to the saving on the Senate Office Building. Now, the net saving to the Government on the entire construction has been $140,855.12.

Mr. SIMS. Due to the services of Mr. Woods?

Mr. TAWNEY. And that saving has been due entirely to the fact that the Superintendent of the Capitol Building has rendered the service, for which otherwise the House Office and Senate Office Building Commissions would have had to employ outside architects, at an increased cost of over $140,000.

Now, what it is proposed to do is to allow Mr. Woods $7,500 compensation for the services he has rendered in saving to the Government of the United States more than $140,000.

In this connection it may be of interest to the Members of the House to know——

Mr. COX of Indiana. What is the salary of the Superintendent of the Capitol?

Mr. TAWNEY. The salary is $6,000 a year, but during the time when he was performing most of this service the salary was only $4,500 a year. His salary was raised only a year ago.

In this connection I want to call attention to the fact that when the National Museum was authorized, at a cost of only a little over $2,000,000, the superintendent of the Congressional Library, charged with the responsibility, not of preparing the plans and specifications, but of supervising the construction of the National Museum, was allowed $2,000 a year in addition to the salary of $5,000 a year which he received as superintendent of the Congressional Library, and he has since that time served in that capacity for a period of over seven years, receiving therefor, merely as superintendent, an aggregate of about $14,000 for the entire service, whereas the Committee on Appropriations recommend only $7,500 for Mr. Woods. I trust that the gentleman will not object to this; but if it is objected to on the ground that it is not authorized by law, then I want to say that page 30 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1905, expressly authorized this commission to employ the services of Mr. Woods or any other architect that they might see fit, and this is only a matter of simple justice. In my judgment the amount ought to have been twice what we have allowed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I desire to be recognized in my own right, simply to ask a question. Is it not also a fact that the Institute of American Architects made considerable complaint because Mr. Woods was permitted to do this work?

Mr. TAWNEY. They did. The Institute of American Architects made a great deal of complaint against the commission for having employed him.

Mr. SIMS. The object of the commission in employing him was to save money to the Government.

Mr. TAWNEY. To save money to the Government, and there has been a very large saving.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I was chairman of the committee on the House Office Building, the special committee on the assignment of rooms in that building. That committee commenced the performance of its duties before this building was completed, and in connection with the position which I occupied I was brought into contact with Mr. Woods for awhile almost daily. I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Woods saved not merely the amount of money which the gentleman from Minnesota has referred to as saved in architects' fees, but that he saved to the Government a quarter or a half of a million dollars in the construction of the House Office Building. There were no large bills for extras in that building. It is one of the few buildings which have been constructed of such a character in the country where, although the cost of the materials had materially increased, the total cost of the building was within the original estimate of the cost. And it was largely owing to the common sense and to the constant care of Mr. Woods, the Superintendent of the Capitol.

Of course, I do not know whether he is entitled to compensation under the provisions of the law or not; but I do believe it is to the interests of the Government to pay such a man for such services rendered outside of his statutory duties a fair and reasonable amount. It has become the practice to provide, in reference to the erection or repair of Government buildings in Washington, that they shall be constructed under the supervision of the Superintendent of the Capitol. There have been several such cases as that. He has not been here asking for compensation in these cases. But when he did the work which he did on the House Office Building it is an economical proposition to pay him for that and expect other public servants will render like services in the future.

Mr. SIMS. And he did not neglect any of his official duties during that time.

Mr. TAWNEY. He did not.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to corroborate all that the gentleman from Illinois has said about Mr. Woods. It was my lot to serve upon the committee with the gentleman from Illinois, and I have personal knowledge of the facts which he has stated. I think we not only saved money in employing Mr. Woods, but we saved immensely by the practical, level-headed common-sense way the work was done, as well as architecturally, in my judgment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to add a word in justification of the recommendation of the committee. Members of the House will recollect the fact that we constructed new buildings at Annapolis at a limit of cost of about $8,000,000 which was subsequently increased to $10,000,000. The architects' fees, or the fees paid the architects who prepared the plans and specifications and superintended construction of those buildings, aggregated almost $500,000. Here is an expenditure almost equal to that and we recommend the paltry sum of $7,500.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question. He and I have no quarrel about the competency of Mr. Woods or about the work he has done and the economy he has effected. But I want to know whether or not, if Mr. Woods gets this $7,500, that that will be in complete payment for everything he has done in superintending the House Office Building?

Mr. TAWNEY. So far as I know there will be no further payment in regard to the House Office Building or the power plant.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Or on the Senate Office Building?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know anything about the Senate Office Building. That is under the control of another commission.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If I could have some assurance that this would be the final amount asked for, I might withdraw the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is a matter of little consequence to me so far as the point of order is concerned, because the employment was authorized by law, at such compensation as the commission deems necessary. The work has been completed, and the compensation carried here has been recommended by the commission.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Let us be perfectly on the square about this. We all admit that Mr. Woods ought to receive some compensation. This item proposes to pay him $7,500 on account of the House Office Building.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the power plant.

Mr. MANN. I do not see anything about the power plant.

Mr. TAWNEY. All the work he has done under the direction of the House commission.

Mr. MANN. How much is he to get for superintending the erection of the Senate Office Building?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know. We have no control over the matter.

Mr. MANN. I think we have.

Mr. TAWNEY. We have not, and if the Committee on Appropriations had reported a provision here for compensation on account of both buildings it would not have been authorized by law. The construction of the Senate building is under authority entirely distinct from the construction of the House Office Building.

Mr. MANN. I understand that, but——

Mr. TAWNEY. And I do not know that the Senate contemplates giving him anything.

Mr. MANN. The Senate does not give it to him. Congress gives it to him.

Mr. TAWNEY. I mean that I do not know that the Senate proposes to increase this amount. I hope the Senate will.

Mr. MANN. That is what I want to get at. Why not fix the amount here now.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not think we ought to.

Mr. MANN. I do not think we have turned over everything in connection with the Senate Office Building to the Senate itself.

Mr. TAWNEY. If they think he is entitled to compensation for services rendered to that commission, we ought to leave it to them.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It seems to me the gentlemen ought to bear in mind the fact that the House Commission has made an estimate for this amount. No estimate has been received from the Senate Commission. It seems to me it would be highly improper to have put into this bill an appropriation for Mr. Woods for the Senate work without any estimate at all.

Mr. MANN. I bear this fact in mind, which evidently the Committee on Appropriations does not bear in mind, that the limit of cost of both of these buildings has been reached.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes; and exceeded.

Mr. MANN. And that this item would not be in order because of that fact.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. It is my understanding that there are repeated rulings to the contrary, where the limit has been reached and passed as in this case.

Mr. MANN. By what authority, the limit of cost having been reached?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. After the Congress has appropriated all the money authorized, as for instance in the case of the Atlanta Penitentiary and the Leavenworth Penitentiary, and it then makes an additional appropriation, that abandons the limit of cost according to numerous decisions.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It seems to me that it is perfectly plain why this bill should carry the expense of the House Office Building as reported by the House Commission and estimated for to this Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANN. I am not opposed to it. I believe in putting them both together.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not see why the gentleman insists that an appropriation for the Senate Office Building should be reported by the Appropriations Committee to the House without an estimate and without any information as to what the Senate Commission wants.

Mr. MANN. We have just as much information about one as the other.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MANN. We have. I do not know what the information of the gentleman from Iowa may be, but no information has been furnished to the House more than we have about both buildings.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The estimate is in for the House Office Building.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have a letter here addressed to me, dated February 21, 1911, which I will read:

OFFICE BUILDING,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1911.

DEAR SIR: We recommend and request that there be included in the general deficiency appropriation bill provisions to pay Elliott Woods, Superintendent of the Capitol Building, the sum of $7,500 for services rendered in the preparation of plans for and superintending the construction of the House Office Building, the Capitol power plant, and the subway connecting the Capitol and House Office Building, and to James C. Courts, clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, the sum of $2,500 for his services as secretary to the House Office Building Commission from the time of its organization in March, 1903, to the present date.

Both of these employments and payment therefor were authorized by a provision carried in the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1905.

It is proper to add that neither Mr. Woods nor Mr. Courts has heretofore been paid anything for the services they have rendered nor has the commission, during its period of service, employed anyone else to act in the capacity in which they have served.

Very respectfully,

J. G. CANNON,
WALTER I. SMITH,
House Office Building Commission.

Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Now will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Whether or not he has any information from Mr. Woods whatever, if it is not disclosing any confidence, that if this sum of $7,500 be allowed to Mr. Woods he will accept that in lieu of all services, not only for supervising the House Office Building, but the Senate Office Building as well?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say frankly and truthfully to the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. COX of Indiana. I know you will, whatever you may say.

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). That I have never had a word of conversation with Mr. Woods on the subject. He has never asked me to make any recommendation. The matter was not even discussed between him and myself at any time and so far as I am concerned as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I have based my recommendations upon my judgment and belief that so far as Mr. Woods's services to the House Commission was concerned he is entitled to all that we are proposing to give him and even more.

Now, the question of whether the Senate Commission considers that he is entitled to the additional amount on account of superintending the construction of that building is a matter for the Senate Commission to determine, and if they recommend that, in their judgment, he is entitled to compensation, then the matter of his aggregate compensation will be a matter of legitimate conference between the two Houses of Congress. I do not think we ought to preclude or attempt to preclude the Senate Commission from expressing its judgment regarding the question of whether or not Mr. Woods is entitled to any additional compensation above the salary which was paid him for other duties and in performing the services which he did for that commission, and I trust the gentleman——

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, considerable time has already been taken up in the discussion of this item. There is no dispute between the chairman of this committee and myself in regard to the ability of Mr. Woods. We all agree he is competent and qualified to fill this important position. We all agree that he is able, efficient, and a wise public official; but I do not agree with the chairman of this committee that we must all the time place a premium upon efficiency.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, if the gentleman from Indiana will pardon me, I am not recommending this appropriation as a premium on efficiency, but as a legitimate compensation for services imposed upon a faithful public official upon whom we had no right to impose them under his statutory employment.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will agree also that the gentleman saved the Government a good deal of money, but when he did that he did nothing in the world but what his plain, positive duty as a public servant demanded he should do. That is all he did; that is all he was entitled to; and in response to the last proposition stated by the gentleman from Minnesota, that there was an additional burden imposed upon this man in supervising a public building, a complete answer to that is that he was ready and willing to assume the additional burden because drawing his salary at the time, and there is not a word of testimony or any statement made here this evening that he ever demurred or objected for one moment when this additional burden was imposed upon him, but he voluntarily entered upon the additional work, whatever that may be. I have heard the argument made here time and time again that because one public official has done this and another public official has done that, and one public official has brought about some particular economy, for that reason, and that alone, we ought to increase his salary. I object to such legislation as that. And until the chairman of the committee produces the law upon which he contends he is able to hang this appropriation, I insist upon my point of order, and I do it very largely upon the proposition that no assurance is given by the chairman of the committee that this amount will be final. And when it goes to the other end of the Capitol it will emerge from there with an addition to this $7,500 put upon it, and we may be called upon to pay $15,000 instead of $7,500.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold his point of order for a moment? This gentleman, Mr. Woods, is peculiarly the servant of this House. He has pride in Congress and in the work of this body and in the success of its undertakings, and I think it is much safer to remunerate this sort of a man than if this legislative body always depended entirely upon the appointees in the executive departments.

I want to say that I believe it would be a wise thing if there was an assistant engineer, or a man having the capacity of an engineer, to be employed by this House to assist the District Committee in its legislation for the improvement of streets and for other permanent improvements in the city of Washington, as an offset against the influence that Executive power has over its own appointees. I think this is something more than a mere personal compliment to Mr. Woods. I think we ought to rely on our own servants and use them as much as we can. Mr. Woods would have, the same as any other man, the pride of having his name connected with this great building, and would perhaps regard that as compensation enough, but I think it is absolutely niggardly on our part not to give him something. I think there is a higher consideration than any contract that can be made. Let us have more of this thing done hereafter, instead of employing experts outside of this House, who have no pride in the success of the economies that may be attempted by this House. I hope my friend from Indiana [Mr. Cox] will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. DAWSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] in what volume and on what page in the statutes this provision allowing compensation to Mr. Woods can be found?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is to be found in the sundry civil act approved March 6, 1905, page 30.

The CHAIRMAN. Under what subtitle?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is under the head of the "Department of the Interior—Public Buildings." The proviso reads as follows:

Provided, That any clerk or other employee designated by the commission on the Senate Office Building or the House Office Building, or the joint commission on the Capitol extension, respectively, and who may now be receiving a salary from the Government, shall be paid from the date of his appointment such compensation as may be fixed by the respective commissions, not to exceed $1,000 per annum in any case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire whether the amount of $7,500 was fixed by the commission as compensation for Mr. Woods?

Mr. TAWNEY. Seven thousand five hundred dollars was the amount fixed by the commission, as shown by the letter, which I read a moment ago, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and signed by the two members of the House Office Building Commission.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What is the amount stated in the law?

The CHAIRMAN. Is that amount in excess of the sum of $1,000 per annum?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman please send to the Chair a copy of the sundry civil act from which he has just read?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that the services have extended over a period of eight years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds in the sundry civil appropriation bill approved March 3, 1905, the following proviso:

Provided, That any clerk or other employee designated by the commission on the Senate Office Building or the House Office Building, or the joint commission on the Capitol extension, respectively, and who may now be receiving a salary from the Government, shall be paid from the date of his appointment such compensation as may be fixed by the respective commissions, not to exceed $1,000 per annum in any case.

The Chair understands from the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] that Mr. Woods's services have extended over a period of eight years, and that the Commission on the House Office Building has recommended that he be paid $7,500. In view of that, the Chair overrules the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay J. C. Courts compensation for services as secretary of the House Office Building Commission since its creation in 1903, as authorized by the act approved March 3, 1905, $2,500.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want to ask for a little information. I want to ask whether Mr. Courts is the secretary of this commission?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Courts was appointed as the secretary to the commission at the beginning of its organization.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Is this the first money he has drawn as secretary to the commission?

Mr. TAWNEY. He has not drawn a dollar as secretary of that commission from the time of his appointment.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am sure that so far as this branch of the Capitol is concerned, that is all that Col. Courts will ever ask.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say, however, to the gentleman from Indiana, that the detail work in connection with this commission has been done, and much of its responsibility has been borne by Mr. Woods and by the clerk of that commission, Mr. Courts.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want to say in response to that, that while I do not know Mr. Woods personally, I do not know that a more efficient, more absolutely honest, and more capable public servant can be found around this Capitol than Mr. Courts. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. They are two of a kind. [Applause.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am glad to know that they are two of a kind. If Mr. Woods gets his, I am glad to see Mr. Courts get his also. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse the State of Idaho, as provided in the act approved August 18, 1894, for moneys advanced by said State to the United States, under provisions of said act, to secure the survey of lands granted to said State with a view to satisfying the public land grant made by the act admitting the State into the Union, as per certificates covering deposits to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States as fully set forth in House Document No. 1402 of this session, $8,004.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word on page 48 for the purpose of eliciting a little information. This is a suspicious-looking item—the item to reimburse the State of Idaho. I can not see any reason for it. I would like to have somebody explain it.

Mr. HAMER. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to be enlightened on this question myself. I would like to know the cause of the gentleman's suspicion. I do not see anything at all suspicious about the item. It is self-explanatory. [Applause.]

As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, this is simply to reimburse the State of Idaho for money advanced under the law from time to time for the survey of public lands belonging to the State.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are those the surveys we have been doing over and over again ever since we began making them? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Is it not rather unusual for a State to advance money to the United States?

Mr. HAMER. No; it is not unusual out in Idaho. The State of Idaho has done it heretofore, and it has always been reimbursed for it heretofore, and we hope to be reimbursed for this item now.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman tell us what it is for?

Mr. HAMER. I will tell the gentleman from Illinois what it is for. The State is obliged to make these advances for the survey.

Mr. MANN. How does it happen that the United States discriminates against the State of Idaho? The State of Idaho perhaps is more liberal than the other States. The other States do not advance money to the United States.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Does the gentleman make the point that that is an improper advance on the part of the State of Idaho?

Mr. HAMER. Mr. Chairman, I have already explained the status of it. That is the situation. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

MERIDIAN HILL PARK.

Condemnation of land for park purposes in the District of Columbia included between Euclid Street, Columb'a Avenue or Fifteenth Street, W Street or Florida Avenue, and Sixteenth Street extended, in Hall & Elvan's subdivision of Meridian Hill: To enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry into effect the provisions of section 36 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes," $490,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; one-half of which sum, or so much thereof as may be expended, shall be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States, as required in said section 36, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, in four equal annual installments, beginning with the fiscal year 1912, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum upon the deferred payments.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee what is the purpose of including this item in the general deficiency bill? I find nothing in the hearings referring to this park.

Mr. TAWNEY. Meridian Hill Park was authorized in the public-buildings act of 1910.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the purchase of this land been authorized in the public-buildings act?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; it was authorized in the public-buildings act of 1910, and the condemnation proceedings are now underway.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not find anything in the hearings in relation to it, and I thought it was new legislation.

Mr. TAWNEY. There was an estimate submitted for it, but there were no hearings had. It is within the limit of cost, and condemnation proceedings under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior are in progress.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I renew the point of order.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this paragraph is subject to a point of order, because the appropriation is authorized in the public-buildings act passed during the last session of Congress, and is based upon that authorization. I want to say, upon the merits of this proposition, that it is one of the most meritorious park projects in this city.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Detection and prosecution of crimes: For the detection and prosecution of crimes against the United States, the investigation of the official acts, records, and accounts of marshals, attorneys, clerks, and referees of the United States courts and the Territorial courts, and United States commissioners, for which purpose all the official papers, records, and dockets of said officers, without exception, shall be examined by the agents of the Attorney General at any time; for the protection of the person of the President of the United States; for such other investigations regarding official matters under the control of the Department of Justice as may be directed by the Attorney General; to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General, $25,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 53, in line 15, strike out the words "twenty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the words "forty-five."

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the Attorney General informed me this afternoon that $25,000, the amount which the committee has recommended, will be insufficient to meet the requirements of this service during the remainder of this fiscal year, and that unless a sufficient amount is allowed, they will have to lay off some of the force.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What is the additional amount?

Mr. TAWNEY. Twenty thousand dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

General expenses, Forest Service: To supply a deficiency in the appropriation "General expenses, Forest Service," including each and every object authorized by law and specified in the appropriation of $4,672,900 under this title in the "Act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911," approved May 26, 1910, $900,000.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I should like to inquire of some one why this large deficiency, $900,000, has occurred in the Forest Service, and where the amount has gone to? Some one near me suggests that it has gone up in smoke.

Mr. TAWNEY. Most of it has gone up in smoke, and the remainder of it has gone into the graves of the men who sacrificed their lives in fighting forest fires last summer.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Do I understand that all of this $900,000 has been expended?

Mr. TAWNEY. All has been expended, and this amount is due entirely to the expenses incident to the fighting of forest fires last summer, which the gentleman from Colorado knows were excessive.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I understand that fully, and I wish to inquire if this amount has all been accounted for, and turned in?

Mr. TAWNEY. All has been accounted for, and the gentleman will find in the hearings an itemized statement of the expenditures, which statement was furnished by the Agricultural Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the payment of all necessary expenses involved in the interment of the bodies of men who were killed while in the employment of the Department of Agriculture fighting fires on the national forests prior to December 1, 1910, and for the relief of their dependent relatives, also for the hospital services and medical attendance of the injured men; this appropriation to continue available during the fiscal year 1912, and all payments therefrom to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture and to be supported by evidence satisfactory to both of them, $15,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph in order to ask the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, a question. This involves the payment of necessary expenses involved in the interment of the bodies of men who were killed while fighting fires in the National Forests. Of course there is no objection to that, but there is this further provision, "and for the relief of their dependent relatives." I suppose there is an estimate and statement of what this item is to be expended for. How much is it proposed shall be paid to the dependent relatives of any one person?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Secretary of Agriculture, who appeared before the Committee on Appropriations, was asked that question by members of the committee, and he was not able to give a specific statement in each case for the reason that the Secretary said that the department would have to be governed somewhat by the circumstances of the dependent widow and children. He said:

They were temporary employees engaged in fighting fires, and they were caught in the fire which was the most injurious and dangerous of all. These men were buried where we found them, and we want to bring them out and put them at the permanent rangers' stations, with suitable tablets. And then there are a number of very pitiful cases of families left destitute—one woman with five children, absolutely destitute, and there is no way in which we can help her. This sum of $15,000 would be ample, we think, to take care of all the expenses connected with the interment of the dead and to meet such reasonable cases as that of this woman about whom I have just been speaking.

Many of these men who died or were killed in the service, their homes were unknown; they were volunteers and were buried, and when their residence was ascertained it became necessary to reinter them.

Mr. MANN. Nobody is making any point on that part of it.

Mr. TAWNEY. There are only a few cases of complete destitution, and the amount that will be expended under both heads both for the reinterment of those who lost their lives in that service and also for the relief of the destitute widows and children will not exceed $15,000.

Mr. MANN. These widows and children that are left in this case are no more widows and children than the widows and children of other people who have died in the service of the Government.

Mr. TAWNEY. These people were not in the service of the Government. If the gentleman will pardon me, these were men outside of the Government service who voluntarily performed this service and lost their lives. I think there is more of an obligation resting on the Government of the United States to take care of their destitute widows and children when men have sacrificed their lives for the protection of the public property.

Mr. MANN. I do not recognize any distinction between that and an ordinary case of a man who helps a marshal and loses his life—absolutely no distinction. But $15,000 is not a large amount. If this is to be the end of it, no one would except to it; but if this is only the beginning and perhaps $5,000 is to be paid to one estate, it is a different proposition.

Mr. TAWNEY. The number is now ascertained. I do not know that I can state the exact number, nor could the Secretary of Agriculture.

I asked the Secretary of Agriculture this question:

The CHAIRMAN. How much do you propose to pay to the dependent widows and children—have you fixed upon any amount?

Mr. GRAVES. No; we have not.

The CHAIRMAN. You would be governed by circumstances?

Mr. GRAVES. Yes; it would have to be a pretty small amount, because I presume there might be 25 persons who would have relatives that we would consider. Most of them are the floating population that you usually find in a lumber center.

The CHAIRMAN. You want this paragraph so amended as to include the expenses for hospital services and medical attendance?

Mr. GRAVES. Yes, sir. We started a hospital fund; the Red Cross gave us a thousand dollars and we raised among the employees of the Forestry Service some two thousand and odd dollars to meet these expenses, and we have received later accounts which cover about $1,300, and the suggestion was to put those words in so that could be included—those medical services and hospital expenses included in the $15,000, not asking for any more money, but to use that wording in order to enable us to meet that.

Mr. MANN. Is it intended to refund any of the money out of this $15,000?

Mr. TAWNEY. Refund to whom?

Mr. MANN. Refund to these people who contributed it.

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it safe to legislate and authorize one of the departments of the Government to pay for the relief of dependent relatives such sum as it pleases out of a lump-sum appropriation? A hard case comes up and no man's heart is sufficient to withstand the pleading. I think that is very poor legislation. The gentleman himself is a stickler and if he is satisfied, all right.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois, that while I believe as thoroughly as he does that there should be some limitation, yet when we come to inquire into the circumstances we saw how utterly impossible it was to make any limitation. We also saw there was very little danger to the Public Treasury in the absence of the limitation, because of the limited number of people who would be beneficiaries under this provision.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will make this prediction, that if this item goes in and becomes a law some of these people will be paid money and the rest will come to Congress with claims to be paid large sums of money.

Mr. TAWNEY. If that is so, then the administration of the Forestry Service will be at fault, first, for having——

Mr. MANN. I am inclined to think it will be the Committee on Appropriations that will be at fault.

Mr. TAWNEY. First, for having misrepresented the facts to a committee of Congress, and second, not keeping within the limitation which they themselves have voluntarily fixed on this expenditure.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but they will not spend any more money than the $15,000, but people will say "somebody else has been paid more than we," and they will come to Congress, and there is no way of preventing them when you invite them to come. However, I will withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare and exhibit at the international congress for the consideration of questions pertaining to the growing of barley and hops and the manufacture of the products thereof at the city of Chicago, October, 1911, such samples of barley and hops from the collection of the Department of Agriculture heretofore made of said products from different parts of the world and such other articles and material as may be of interest and instructive in connection with the growth or production of articles herein mentioned, and for each and every purpose necessary for and connected with such exhibit, $8,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that, at the request of several gentlemen near me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves the point of order and the gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment. The point of order will have to be disposed of before the amendment is in order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, that paragraph proposes to provide for an exhibition in Chicago, of products pertaining to the growing of barley and hops and the manufactures thereof. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee to tell us about these products of barley and hops that are to be exhibited.

Mr. MANN. If it was merely beer the meeting would be in Milwaukee. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought perhaps this question might be answered by the gentleman from Minnesota, but as the gentleman from Illinois has put the boot on his own foot, I would like to ask him whether these peculiar products are indigenous to the city of Chicago?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as this relates to the beer industry, St. Louis and Milwaukee being rival claimants for that honor, it was decided to locate the exposition at Chicago, convenient to both cities.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am obliged to the gentleman from Wisconsin, whose city has been made famous by these products of the soil, but as one coming from another large city where we know very little about matters of this kind, I should like to know whether this is to be a world-wide exposition or whether it is to apply only to those whose taste for these products is peculiar, as in Milwaukee and St. Louis and Chicago?

Mr. MANN. It will not apply to a deep waterway, I will assure the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That might account for the popularity of other things than waterways. I would like to find out whether this exposition is to be a general exposition to which the nations of the world are to be invited?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is to be an international exposition, and the nations of the world will participate.

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I believe my time has not expired, but I have not yet had an answer to the question I put.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is talking all of the time, and I can not answer. There is to be held in the city of Chicago, during the month of October, I believe of this year, an international exhibition of various cereals or agricultural products, including hops, barley, and barley malt.

I should say also this involves an exhibition of a great many mechanical devices. The Secretary of Agriculture, on the 25th of February, writes the Committee on Appropriations as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 23, 1911.

Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. TAWNEY: The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I believe, did not include in the agricultural appropriation bill an item of $8,000 for the exhibit of this department at the International Barley, Hop, and Malt Exposition to be held in Chicago, Ill., during the fall of 1911. I think the department ought to be represented at this exposition, and I hope you can see your way to take care of the item of $8,000 for this purpose in the urgent deficiency bill. The department has had this matter under consideration for some time, and as the exposition in question is an important international affair, it seems to me eminently proper that the department be represented. I therefore hope that you will be able to provide for this appropriation of $8,000 in the way suggested.

Very truly, yours, JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Agricultural Department has collected samples of barley, hops, and other products of a like character from all parts of the world, and they have an exhibit which, I am informed, is a very instructive and a very interesting exhibit, and the purpose in making this appropriation is to enable the Agricultural Department to first select from these products that they have acquired in the Agricultural Department and then transport that selection to this exposition and there make an exhibition of their collection, which has been made from all over the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman assures the House that this exposition will include exhibits of cereals and machinery.

Mr. TAWNEY. Absolutely; that is the purpose of the appropriation.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat, this is subject to the point of order, I understand.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, it is; but I want to say, however, that bill authorizing this has been reported by a committee of the House. That, of course, does not make it in order, but it shows it has been considered by one of the committees of the House and been recommended to the House.

Mr. SIMS. This is an exhibit of barley, hops, and malt—all beer-making materials?

Mr. TAWNEY. They are, I understand; I am not an expert.

Mr. SIMS. If I understand correctly, these barley and malt people are all objecting to Canadian reciprocity.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, far from it. I would like to say to the gentleman for his information that, as he well knows, although he comes from a noted prohibition State, in the manufacture of the best beer, which is made in cities that have been made famous throughout the world, it is necessary to have a very high grade of barley. These brewers are engaged at the present time in experimenting with various kinds of barley from Austria and Germany, where the quality of the barley is superior to that grown in this country. The Department of Agriculture is engaged in importing these various kinds of barley and transplanting them in experiment stations, so as to develop a better kind of barley.

Mr. SIMS. Let me ask the gentleman a practical question——

Mr. STAFFORD. This exposition is for the purpose of displaying the different kinds of barley grown and other kindred growths.

Mr. SIMS. Let me ask the gentleman a practical question. Does the gentleman think it will tend to reduce drunkenness to encourage the people to drink beer instead of red liquor?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, there is no question about that. In Denmark to-day there is provision made under Government supervision to permit of light beers being sold so as to take away from the people the taste for strong liquor and incline them to the milder beverage. That is also being tried in Sweden, so as to take from the natives the acquired taste for strong liquor. In North Dakota, in that prohibition State, they allow the entrance of mild beverages—beer which contains less than 2 per cent of alcohol, because it is regarded as a temperance beverage. I do not know whether Tennessee is so enlightened, but I hope——

Mr. SIMS. There is no use going to Denmark, the gentleman from Milwaukee ought to be able to answer the question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman knows there is less drunkenness in Milwaukee than——

Mr. SIMS. Being assured that this exposition is to be held in the interest of sobriety and to promote temperance, I will not make the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know the gentleman is very liberal and always in favor of temperance and of temperance beverages. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, as I stated when I reserved the point of order, I did so at the request of several gentlemen around me, and especially my colleagues from New York, who thought it might be embarrassing for them with their home constituents if they directly raised the point of order. And since they do not believe in the business of the manufacture and sale of the products of barley malt, and, furthermore, as they believe the people who do the manufacturing can afford to pay the expenses of these expositions themselves, I make the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Indiana withhold the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph:

"For an exhibit by the Department of Agriculture at the International Dry Farming Congress at Colorado Springs, Colo., October, 1911, $10,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposes an appropriation of $10,000 for an exhibit by the Agricultural Department at the dry-farming congress to be held in Colorado Springs, Colo., in October of this year. An exhibit at a wet exposition has just been held subject to a point of order, but I trust that this exhibit, at a dry-farming exposition, will not be held subject to a point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I think this House is just as much opposed to things dry as they are opposed to things wet, and I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Department of Agriculture is authorized by the organic act to collect and diffuse information. The Chair does not think that an exhibit comes within either the collection of information or diffusing of information, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I think I have drawn an amendment which will escape the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it a new paragraph?

Mr. AUSTIN. It is a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare an exhibit at the Appalachian Exposition at Knoxville, Tenn., between October 12 and October 30, 1911, for the consideration of questions pertaining to the conservation of the resources of the Appalachian region, $10,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, there is no subject that has been of such general interest as that of conservation of our natural resources. A year ago the enterprising city of Knoxville, Tenn., held the first conservation exposition in this country. They did not seek an appropriation at the hands of Congress, or their State legislature, or the city of Knoxville, but the enterprising citizens of that city by private subscription raised more than $100,000. We gave an exposition lasting one month, and during that time more than 300,000 citizens from various parts of the Republic visited the exposition. It was one of the most unique and creditable exhibitions ever held in the South, and especially without national or State aid. We had extensive exhibits of not only the mineral and manufacturing resources, but of the agricultural resources.

No longer is the watchword "Go west," but it points to that matchless section of the South, where opportunities are unlimited, where development is only in its infancy, and where we have inexhaustible deposits of coal, iron, marble, and almost untouched forests of hardwood timber, a genial climate, a climate in which men can be employed in the open more than eight months in the year.

The North and the West have already practically filled up and are overflowing; but this region below us, this great mineral belt from the Virginias to Alabama, has more undeveloped wealth, splendid opportunities for investment, chances for the young and the ambitious and for the investor, than any other region of our great country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would there be a chance in that beautiful country, which the gentleman describes, for an overplus of population such as exists in the large cities of the country?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; especially if that overplus is representative of the type of population so finely represented on the floor of this House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I expected that [laughter], but will not the gentleman devote his thoughts for a part of the time remaining to him to the opportunities afforded in his country for those who live in the congested centers, who might be more happily and more healthfully employed if they were enabled to take advantage of the opportunities he pictures?

Mr. AUSTIN. The State of Tennessee has a foreign population of less than 3 per cent. We should like to have those good Pennsylvania Dutchmen or their descendants, such as are in part represented by the gentleman, and the Scotchmen and Scotch-Irish, Irish, Swedes, Scandinavians; but we have no use in the Appalachian region for the foreign undesirables of the large cities of the North. If you will give us the industrious, law-abiding, patriotic foreign element, we will not only welcome them, but we will thrice welcome them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The law of this country presumes that no undesirables are admitted to the United States.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is a very violent presumption, in view of the numerous crimes that are being committed every day by the Black Hand Society, for example, even in the heart of New York City.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That organization is just as much condemned by people of foreign birth in the congested centers as it is condemned by the gentleman from Tennessee and those whom he represents. There is no place in any of the large cities to-day for men who believe in the Black Hand, for men who draw the dagger, throw the bombs, or do any of those other things that excite the indignation and opprobrium of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks to have his time extended two minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. AUSTIN. There is not only an attractive unoccupied field for investment in that Appalachian region, but there is also a cordial welcome awaiting every man who wants to improve his condition and who is law-abiding, industrious, and patriotic.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. People of that kind were the only persons of alien birth to whom I had reference. I would like to see the opportunities which the gentleman presents afforded to those people.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then send them to the Knoxville Appalachian Exposition at Knoxville, Tenn., from October 12, to October 30, and we will send 10,000 mountain men to meet them and give them the best that there is to be had. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no doubt they will come in no hostile or unfriendly spirit, and will be warmly welcomed by the people to whom the gentleman refers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on this discussion. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION.

Expenses of regulating immigration: For the payment to State institutions for the treatment of aliens deported on or prior to June 30, 1909, under the provisions of section 20 of the act of February 20, 1907 (34 Stats., p. 904), which provides: "That any alien who shall enter the United States in violation of law, and such as become public charges from causes existing prior to landing, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be taken into custody and deported to the country whence he came at any time within three years after the date of his entry into the United States. Such deportation, including one-half of the entire cost of removal to the port of deportation, shall be at the expense of the contractor, procurer, or other person by whom the alien was unlawfully induced to enter the United States, or, if that can not be done, then the cost of removal to the port of deportation shall be at the expense of the immigrant fund," $13,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Minnesota will give me his attention for a moment. This fund of $13,000 is to cover expenses heretofore incurred for the deportation of aliens, is it not?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reference is made here to the act of February 20, 1907, which pertains to the immigrant fund. That fund has been abolished, has it not?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman whether the aliens whose deportation resulted in this item of $13,000 were housed while in custody in buildings belonging to the Government of the United States, or in buildings owned by municipalities, or buildings owned by steamship and railroad companies?

Mr. TAWNEY. They were housed in buildings owned by municipalities and private associations.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that——

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the gentleman any objection to the appropriation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. None at all. I merely wanted some light thrown upon this particular paragraph, as well as upon some other items in which I am interested.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the gentleman has as much light as the committee has.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman and to the House, during the few minutes I have left, that it seems to me a pernicious practice to have aliens who are to be deported kept in buildings owned by the companies that have brought them to the United States. I believe that the Government of the United States ought to be fully equipped to take them in custody and retain them until they are deported.

Mr. TAWNEY. None of this money is on account of the housing or the care of aliens in buildings owned by steamship companies. If it was, there would be no necessity to appropriate money for that purpose.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Furthermore, if they could ascertain the steamship company that brought the people to this country, they would have to take them back free and pay one-half the expense of bringing them back to the port and for housing them while they were being detained.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Government is paying $13,000 here, which apparently the steamship companies ought to be made to pay. That is to say, the companies that brought these aliens here, if they are of the undesirable class referred to a moment ago by the gentleman from Tennessee, should send them back.

The point I am making, and it comes home to a number of the ports of this country, is that the Government itself ought to be in a position to take care of these people whom it arrests and keeps in custody, and that they ought not to be left to the care of those who have an interest in letting them go. They ought to be under the surveillance of the Government of the United States until they are taken away.

Mr. KEIFER. Wherever they are, they are under the control of the Government.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, the steamship companies are held responsible by the Government, and they do pay this money; and wherever they can be identified they will pay their part of this $13,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman mean to say that this $13,000, which the Government is now paying for the deportation of aliens some years ago, will be returned to the Government?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Every dollar of it will be returned to the Government where they can identify the steamship company.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How will they be identified?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It is not difficult.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How will that $13,000 be charged up to anybody, if the Government pays it?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The law provides that where an alien becomes a public charge within three years, from causes arising prior to landing, that alien shall be deported.

They become public charges, and the Government picks them up on a warrant. If a State incurs expenses on that account, the Government pays the State and then collects from the steamship company.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When found.

Mr. BENNET of New York. They are found easily enough. We have manifests reaching back to 1891 which are complete, and the law provides only a three-year limitation. The sums collected in this way reach up, as I recall it, to something like $75,000 a year, which amount is collected from the steamship companies.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the gentleman why it is that these undesirables come ashore? I supposed they were passed on while on shipboard and were not permitted to come ashore at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can answer that, if the gentleman from New York will permit me.

Mr. TAWNEY. Probably the gentleman from New York can answer it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think I can answer it, probably, better than he can. I can give specific instances.

Mr. STAFFORD. Both gentlemen ought to be allowed an opportunity to answer, in order that we may determine whose answer is the better one.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that with 800,000 or 900,000 people coming in every year it is not strange that once in awhile an undesirable slips through. The deportations under this section amount to about 2,000 cases a year, which is not a very large percentage.

You can not always tell an insane person when he comes through the examining place; you can not always tell a person who has been sick or who has impaired vitality, and they deport them. I am not arithmetician enough to figure out what per cent 2,000 is of 1,000,000, but it is very small, and 2,000 are all that are deported.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The 2,000 might account for the so-called undesirables.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Two thousand would go a long way to account for the undesirables. That is one of the injustices of the whole thing. One Italian who sends a Black Hand letter attracts more attention throughout the country than 250,000 Italians who attend to their own business and go out every day to earn a living.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman from New York admit that since the abolition of the immigration fund it has been very difficult to obtain appropriations for immigration stations in the regular way?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not in New York.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am quite sure not in New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional assistants to clerks of courts in naturalization cases: For additional clerical assistance in naturalization matters for the clerks of the supreme court for Kings County, N. Y., and the supreme court for New York County, N. Y., in addition to the available one-half of the naturalization fees for clerical assistance in such matters during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, $2,861.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Under the provisions of existing law, is there anything that requires the Government to pay additional compensation for clerks in the State courts?

Mr. TAWNEY. The law expressly authorizes the appropriation. The amount appropriated for the current fiscal year is not sufficient to meet the requirements of the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that the law relating to naturalization provided that one-half of the fees should be used in payment of clerical expenses.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that that is the law, except in cities where they collect more than $6,000 a year. In cities where they collect less the clerks get the fees. In cities where they get more the clerks only get one-half of the $6,000. Above that amount the Government may authorize the hiring of additional clerical assistance, to be paid for out of the sum not to exceed the full value. The large cities are discriminated against to the extent that the clerk of courts only receive one-half of the $6,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much is appropriated for excess services of this character in New York City?

Mr. CALDER. The amount appropriated for this year, including one-half of the first $6,000, amounts to $19,618. It is estimated that the collections of these two courts this year will amount to $54,000, so the Government will have a profit of $34,000.

Mr. BENNET of New York. It is a profitable business for the Government.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

OUT OF THE POSTAL REVENUES.

GREATER NEW YORK LETTER CARRIERS.

To pay the claims of Greater New York letter carriers for additional salary under section 2 of the act of January 3, 1887 (24 Stat., 355), the decision of the Court of Claims and the decisions of the Auditor for the Post Office Department and Comptroller of the Treasury, being the unpaid portions chargeable to the fiscal year 1908 and prior years, the appropriations therefor having been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund, said claims being fully set forth in House Document No. 1361 of the present session of Congress, $78,857.45.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to that paragraph.

Mr. COCKS of New York. I hope the gentleman will reserve it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The hour is getting late, and I understand the chairman of the committee is anxious to finish the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Mr. Chairman, this has been properly allowed by the accounting officers. It arises from the fact that when Greater New York was established these various post offices were taken within the city. The clerks and carriers thought they were entitled to, and it has been decided that they were entitled to, the pay of first-class offices. That was denied them for several years, but since 1908 they have received the additional pay. These claims have been audited and allowed, and I think the chairman of the committee, Mr. TAWNEY, has a letter from the Secretary on the subject.

Mr. TAWNEY. The points of order having been made, I desire to say that these are audited claims. They have been considered by the Auditor of the Post Office Department, and I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury saying that these claims have been referred to Congress under the provisions of section 2 of the act of July 7, 1884. I was in doubt for several days as to whether the claims referred to in this document were audited claims, but after receiving this letter from the Secretary of the Treasury and reexamining the claims and the report, I find that they are as much an audited account as any of the audited accounts carried in the general deficiency appropriation bill, and are therefore in order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in this provision of the claim sought to be recovered to distinguish it from any other claim of any other employee of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. They have been audited.

Mr. STAFFORD. I grant that.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair overrules the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LEGISLATIVE.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which was offered to-day when the bill was read, to follow line 3, after the word "legislative."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 51, after the word "legislative," insert:

"To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House borne on the annual and session rolls on the 1st day of February, 1911, including the Capitol police, official reporters of the Senate and House, and W. A. Smith, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD clerk, for extra services during the third session of the Sixty-first Congress a sum equal to one month's pay at the compensation then paid them by law, the same to be immediately available."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $14,388.84.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I assume this is a matter of personal privilege and that under the rules I could present it as such. We have just passed the item carrying $14,388.84 to pay the expenses of contested elections. Those who have had contests understand the difficulties that confront the sitting Member. Those difficulties in the earlier part of this session confronted me. A contest was entered against me, so that I now know what it means to men whose seats in this House are subjected to contest. I question whether there ought not to be a revision of the law with regard to contests. It is a very annoying proposition for a man elected to this House, and coming here in good faith to represent his constituents, to be harassed and annoyed by anyone who cares to open proceedings and embarrass his work during practically the whole of his term.

It happens that this House provides the means by which contests are encouraged and conducted. Perhaps this is wrong. Some day, when a sufficient number of Members of the House, unjustly accused, may have this experience, the House may see it in that light. I do not care to pursue this matter at this time further than to say that although allowances have been made here, and very properly so, under the law, there are contests instituted against Members which in some instances are wholly unjustifiable and should not be encouraged by the hope or inducement of an appropriation from this House.

In my own case, elected over the contestant by nearly 17,000 majority, I find now, after having employed an attorney and prepared myself for a defense in the usual way, as every other sitting Member must whose seat is contested—after all this has been done, notice comes to me that the contest is withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. Is not the gentleman glad of it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This letter of withdrawal I now send to the desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read in the gentleman's time.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 20, 1911.

MURDOCH KENDRICK, Esq.,
1420 Chestnut Street.

DEAR SIR: J. G. Ramsdell, Esq., the contestant for the seat of J. HAMPTON MOORE, Esq., in the third congressional district, has decided to discontinue the contest. There will, therefore, be no further proceedings taken in this matter.

Yours, respectfully, PIERCE ARCHER, Jr.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that this letter should be a matter of record. I submit it for that purpose only. I hope now to remain in this House during the incoming administration for two years, and to do the best I can for those who sent me here.

Mr. STURGISS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Insert, following line 19, on page 62:

"To Richard Randolph McMahon, for legal services as of counsel to the Members of the House of Representatives of the Joint Committee on Printing in a suit at law, No. 52342, Valley Paper Co., plaintiff, v. The Joint Committee on Printing of Congress, respondents, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, in February, 1910, $500."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

Mr. STURGISS. Mr. Chairman, the same point of order was made at the last session of Congress, overruled by the Chair, and an appeal was taken from that ruling of the Chair on that proposition, and the House sustained the ruling of the Chair. The question was raised whether or not it was founded upon law. The Members of the House have not forgotten the controversy that arose last year. The joint committee composed of the Printing Committee of this House and the corresponding committee of the Senate was sued because they had awarded certain contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless some gentleman desires to be heard on the other side, the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. STURGISS. Will the Chairman permit me to refer him to the ruling in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the ruling here.

Mr. STURGISS. Then I have nothing further to say.

The CHAIRMAN. On June 17, 1910, it was held by the Chairman of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. TILSON, that a resolution authorizing certain Members to appear and act in response to a rule of a court was sufficient authorization for an appropriation in a general appropriation bill for their counsel. From that decision an appeal was taken and the Chair was sustained without division. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do I understand the Chair to hold this amendment is in order, according to the ruling——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that, in accordance with the ruling made last year on exactly the same proposition, and from which ruling an appeal was taken, and the Chair was sustained without division, and upon that decision the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the question of fact may be mistaken. I was under the impression that the ruling last year was that the committee had authority to employ counsel. I think there is no pretense that the committee employed this counsel.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the ruling last year was that the resolution authorizing certain Members to appear and act in response to a ruling of a court was held to be sufficient authorization for an appropriation in a general appropriation bill for their counsel.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, was there any authorization for the employment of this counsel?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question the Chair can not pass upon.

Mr. GARRETT. It is not presented in the amendment here.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment, as the Chair understands, is identical with the amendment offered last year. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment will not be agreed to. This matter was discussed on a previous occasion, and the two members on printing of the committee of the House disavowed having ever authorized the employment of this man. The Member at whose instance he was employed claimed that he had employed him on his own motion. This proposition was rejected once before, and I hope it will be rejected again.

Mr. STURGISS. Mr. Chairman, I beg to refresh the memory of Members of the House, especially of the gentleman from Illinois, by reference to the RECORD. It clearly appears that this gentleman appeared as cocounsel, with the authority of the other members of the committee. It was true in the first instance he was called in at my suggestion, and the reasons are fully set out in the RECORD, and I do not want to rehash the matter. This House allowed $500 at that time, over an appeal on the point of order, after a full discussion, after this House, through its Judiciary Committee, had spent a whole day and part of a night discussing the matter, and directed its committee to appear and enter an appearance and make a proper defense.

They did so and they won out on the case and the House allowed $1,000 to Hamilton & Yerkes, and $500 to Col. McMahon, but at no time had Col. McMahon failed to discharge his duties in consultation with the other attorneys. That appropriation went to the Senate and there, as you will recall, the Senate having refused to employ counsel or to make an appearance, Senator SMOOT, chairman of the joint committee, upon a letter filed by Hamilton & Yerkes repudiating the amount you had allowed them, of $1,000, because you had not allowed $5,000, Senator SMOOT moved to strike out the item which was to pay $1,000 to Hamilton & Yerkes and $500 for Col. McMahon. This House by an overwhelming vote awarded that amount to the senior attorneys who were in the case and who did not do more work in proportion than Col. McMahon, but they repudiated the action of the House because you did not allow them $5,000, and they would not accept $1,000.

The letter is here in the record. And, acting upon that, the bill went to a committee of conference; and through some influence—and I do not mean any reflection—but through some misapprehension or misstatement, the whole item was rejected. Now, so far as Col. McMahon is concerned, he is entitled to the sum of $500. He rendered the service; he appeared in court on some seven or eight different days; he appeared in consultation, without objection, with the other attorneys; and he never at any time said he was in the case simply for advertising purposes and that he would charge nothing. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asked me if he did not agree not to charge anything. I have McMahon's letter, and I asked him personally about it, and he said that never at any time did he make any such statement to any person.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has called me into the controversy. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STURGISS. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood, when I asked the gentleman the question a year ago, that this gentleman from West Virginia proffered his services and made no claim that he was to make any charge whatsoever for those services, and he led the other members of the Committee on Printing to believe that this would be a voluntary act for the sole purpose of giving him notoriety in the discharge of this work.

Mr. STURGISS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. No member of the committee has made any such statement at any time, neither the chairman nor any member. As to the assertion that he voluntarily appeared for the sake of the reputation it might give him, I have here a copy of the letter I wrote him asking him to appear in the case, and in pursuance of that he met co-counsel, and he met the other members of the committee in consultation, and did his work, and did it well. I only ask that the House maintain its action of a year ago. The amount of the compensation is very reasonable.

My good friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] himself, in his remarks upon that subject, said that it was a very reasonable compensation.

Mr. GARRETT. Did the gentleman ask him to appear on authority from the committee?

Mr. STURGISS. With just as much authority as any member of the committee asked the other counsel to appear, though he appeared first at my suggestion, but in cooperation with the other counsel, and with their approval, or, at least, without the objection of either counsel or of the other members of the committee.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; but I want to ask the gentleman, Did the committee employ him, or was it the personal act of the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. STURGISS. It was my personal act in the first instance, but, as I say, he was present with the committee, and they acquiesced, and they had the benefit of his service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the House after a long discussion fixed the payment of $1,000 for the real counsel in the case. I thought the amount was large enough at that time, but the House determined after discussion to fix the counsel fees at $1,000 for the men who tried the case and who did the work; and to pay this man who butted in $500, and not pay the other, seems to be a very queer proposition for us.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter the payments made from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives upon vouchers approved by the Committee on Accounts shall be deemed, held, and taken, and are hereby declared, to be conclusive upon all the departments and officers of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 63, after line 3, insert the following:
"For compiler and indexer of reports and hearing of House standing and select committees (William Tyler Page), under the direction of the Committee on Accounts, and for such other duties as the committee may require, at the rate of $4,000 per annum, from March 4, 1911, to June 30, 1912, inclusive, $5,300."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to reserve the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I prefer not to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting the following after line 5, page 63:
"To pay Edwin L. Williams, clerk to Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, additional compensation, $500."

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Robert W. Dyer, clerk to the Committee on the Public Lands, additional compensation, $500.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order on the paragraph. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay George Jennison, special messenger, as additional compensation, $200.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay R. B. Horton for services rendered the Committee on Insular Affairs $250.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order on that item. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expert, clerical, and stenographic services, to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House on vouchers approved by Representative OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, and to continue available during the fiscal year 1912, $7,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order on the item.

Mr. MANN. I did not give the gentleman from Indiana a chance to make the point of order. [Laughter.]

I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman, if the purpose of this is to permit the expected members of the Democratic Ways and Means Committee to go ahead with their tariff hearings?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say that this provision was prepared and placed in the bill at the request of the prospective chairman of the next Ways and Means Committee of the next House of Representatives.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that the limitation of time ought to be only until the next House of Representatives meets?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, no, I do not, for the reason that——

Mr. MANN. This is to continue available through the fiscal year 1912. That is, after the end of the next regular session of Congress?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That ought to be available during all that time.

Mr. MANN. But you will be in possession of the House——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is all true, but——

Mr. MANN. And you will have control of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, just so that we get it, we do not care where we get it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Understand, I am in favor of giving the gentleman the money.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This is the situation: When they were preparing the Payne tariff bill all that Mr. PAYNE had to do was to make a requisition on the departments over here in order to get all the assistants he wanted to make any kind of an investigation under heaven. He relied on those men. Mr. UNDERWOOD wants these experts, so that he can rely on these people. I think he ought to have them, and every man who has served on the Ways and Means Committee knows how much services of that kind are needed.

Mr. MANN. I know that everybody concedes that the Ways and Means Committee ought to have the opportunity to go ahead, and if the gentleman believes these employees are needed, they ought to be paid, and they ought to be paid out of the Public Treasury. But is it fair to Mr. UNDERWOOD himself to give him a sum of $7,500 to spend at his will during the next session of Congress?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, perhaps I ought to state that the amount fixed here was based on the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as to the number of experts and clerks he desired and the compensation to be paid each of them per month, and it made up the sum of $7,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay M. C. Shield additional compensation for services during the Sixty-first Congress, $600.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse the official reporters of debates and the stenographers to committees on the rolls on February 22, 1911, for moneys actually expended by them for clerical assistance and for extra clerical services during the third session of the Sixty-first Congress, $750 each; to Mrs. Elizabeth Welch, widow of A. C. Welch, $500; and to John J. Cameron, $240; in all, $7,490.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, it may suit the gentleman from Indiana to retaliate upon the gentleman from Illinois for not allowing him to make the point of order on that other item first [laughter], but——

Mr. COX of Indiana. I did not retaliate.

Mr. TAWNEY. You did not need to make that statement. Everybody understood it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman should not say that.

Mr. TAWNEY. This, Mr. Chairman, is a provision that has been carried in this bill from time immemorial, to remburse the official reporters of the House for their expenses in the transcription of their notes, by people employed for that purpose, whom they pay out of their own pockets. It has been the uniform practice of the House to reimburse them. All of the employees in the offices of the official reporters downstairs are employed at the expense of the official reporters, and it would be impossible for them to perform the service they do without this assistance.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield to let me ask a question, I think we can come to terms about it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to complete my statement.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will insist on my point of order unless the gentleman yields for a question.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman say that the reporters mentioned in this paragraph have actually paid this money out of their own pockets?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; I do.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay George B. Serenbetz, J. B. Holloway, and Marie G. Potter $600 each, additional compensation for services rendered the Committee on War Claims and the Committee on Claims, respectively, $1,800.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order on the paragraph. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay James A. Gassaway for services as a laborer in the offices of the Chief Clerk, the disbursing clerk, and in the stationery room from August 6 to December 6, 1909, $150.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I make a point of order on that.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask whether these are session or annual employees? If they are session employees, it seems to me the point of order ought not to lie.

The CHAIRMAN. It matters not in this particular case whether they are session or annual employees. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Joseph B. Sparks for extra services rendered during the Sixty-first Congress, $87.50.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I make a point of order on that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order on the paragraph, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay to E. R. Ernst additional compensation for extra services rendered during the Sixty-first Congress, $200.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order on the paragraph. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation at the rate of $1,200 per annum each for the services of Marshall Pickering and Charles L. Williams, respectively, as special messengers in the majority and minority caucus rooms.

Mr. O'CONNELL. I make the point of order against that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Dio W. Dunham for extra services rendered during the Sixty-first Congress, $300.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay N. T. Hynson, clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, additional compensation, $500.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order on the paragraph. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay W. H. Estey, cashier in the office of the Sergeant at Arms, $850.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay J. C. Stewart for caring for and regulating the House chronometer, $100.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Edward S. Glavis, clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, additional compensation, $500.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order on the paragraph. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Charles S. Greenwood, clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, additional compensation, $500.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For indexing and typewriting services, at $75 per month from March 4, 1911, to June 30, 1912, to continue the compilation of laws, etc., relating to the employees, duties, and compensation of employees of the House of Representatives and matter pertaining to the disbursement of the contingent fund authorized by resolution of March 10, 1910, $1,400.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, to that I reserve a point of order. I want to ask the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill whether there is authority for the appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is; the authority is found in the resolution of March, 1910.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. There seems to be $75 a month for the compilations of laws and matter pertaining to the disbursement of the contingent fund of the House. I suppose this has been running some time. It is rare to find anybody on the floor of the House that knows anything about the law relating to the disbursement of the contingent fund, and even the Committee on Accounts is sometimes troubled to get at them. If we have had a committee working a year compiling the laws, for the Lord's sake, how long will it take to complete it? These laws can not be more than four or five pages in length.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think if the gentleman will consult the members of the Committee on Accounts he will find that there has been a very complete compilation of these laws. I do not think, however, that the gentleman has taken the trouble to inquire whether anything has been done or not. The authority for the appropriation is found in the following resolution:

[Sixty-first Congress, second session.]

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, to continue from the close of the Sixtieth Congress, the compilation of laws, decisions, tabular statements, and debates, pursuant to the act of March 3, 1901, relative to the employment, duties, and compensation of the employees of the House of Representatives, to which shall be added matter pertaining to the disbursement of the contingent fund of the House, for stenographic and typewriting services, not exceeding the rate of $75 per month, authorized by House resolution adopted January 10, 1908.

I am informed by the Committee on Accounts that this expenditure has not been made to any clerk or employee of any committee, but has been expended for clerical services in doing the work.

Mr. MANN. Of course the resolution which the gentleman has read is not a sufficient basis for this item.

Mr. DAWSON. If the gentleman will allow me, the work has progressed from the beginning of the Government down, I think, to about the Fifty-seventh or Fifty-eighth Congress.

Mr. MANN. Then why can we not get the information?

Mr. DAWSON. Because it is not completed.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the gentleman from Illinois tried to get it?

Mr. MANN. I have tried to get it, but have been unable to.

Mr. DAWSON. I will state that the preparation of this set of volumes, which will be about two in number, requires very careful examination of the statutes, together with the decisions of the comptroller. I understand it was the gentleman from Indiana that wanted the information.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I wanted to know if there was any authority of law to make the appropriation?

Mr. DAWSON. The chairman of the committee has cited the law and I was undertaking to explain the progress of the work, and its present condition.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. KENDALL). The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MANN. But does the Chair understand that this resolution was expressly limited to the Sixtieth Congress?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Minnesota to say that it was not.

Mr. TAWNEY. The resolution was adopted January 10, 1908.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman read the resolution, and see if it is not expressly limited to the life of that Congress?

Mr. TAWNEY. The resolution expressly says—that there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to continue from the close of the Sixtieth Congress.

It runs indefinitely.

Mr. MANN. I did not understand the gentleman to so read the resolution.

Mr. TAWNEY. The service began at the close of the Sixtieth Congress and has continued ever since under that authority.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 66, after line 3, insert:
"For folding speeches and pamphlets at the rate of not exceeding $1 per thousand during the year 1912, $2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment to Samuel Robinson, William Madden, and Joseph De Fontes, as messengers on night duty during the third session of the present Congress, for extra services, $700 each; in all, $2,100.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman in charge of this bill what these men's salaries are now.

Mr. TAWNEY. Two dollars and forty cents a day.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Too much money; too much money. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

JUDGMENTS, UNITED STATES COURTS.

For payment of the final judgments and decrees, including costs of suit, which have been rendered under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," certified to Congress at its present session by the Attorney General in House Document No. 1327, and which have not been appealed, $14,926.59, together with such additional sum as may be necessary to pay interest on the respective judgments at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the date thereof until the time this appropriation is made: Provided, That none of the judgments herein provided for shall be paid until the right of appeal shall have expired.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of expressing in connection with this particular item, which does not affect the city of New York in any way, the thanks of my colleagues and myself and of the city of New York to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who is so soon, to our great regret, to leave us, for the many kindnesses which we have had at his hands during the time he has been chairman of this committee. There is an impression that there is discrimination against great cities. Possibly at times that is so, but I want to bear testimony to the fact that during the last six years at least the chairman of this great committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], has treated our city with entire justice, and that every request that we have made of the Committee on Appropriations, which was authorized by law, has been received with courteous consideration and we have received the money. Before the gentleman goes out of office I think it is due to him that those of us who are here from the great city of New York should express to him the appreciation we have for the consideration we have had at his hands during the years of his chairmanship. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

JUDGMENTS IN INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

For payment of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in Indian depredation cases, certified to Congress in House Document No. 1371, at its present session, $14,829; said judgments to be paid after the deductions required to be made under the provisions of section 6 of the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for the adjustment and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations," shall have been ascertained and duly certified by the Secretary of the Interior to the Secretary of the Treasury, which certification shall be made as soon as practicable after the passage of this act, and such deductions shall be made according to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, having due regard to the educational and other necessary requirements of the tribe or tribes affected; and the amounts paid shall be reimbursed to the United States at such times and in such proportions as the Secretary of the Interior may decide to be for the interests of the Indian Service: Provided, That no one of said judgments provided in this paragraph shall be paid until the Attorney General shall have certified to the Secretary of the Treasury that there exists no grounds sufficient, in his opinion, to support a motion for a new trial or an appeal of said cause.

SEC. 2. That for the payment of the following claims, certified to be due by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, and under appropriations heretofore treated as permanent, being for the service of the fiscal year 1908 and prior years, unless otherwise stated, and which have been certified to Congress under section 2 of the act of July 7, 1884, as fully set forth in House Document No. 1368, reported to Congress at its present session, there is appropriated as follows:

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the following items up to section 3 of the bill are all judgments of the United States courts, the Court of Claims, or audited claims. They have been once read to-day and I ask unanimous consent that the remaining pages up to and including page 81 be considered as read.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, in this connection I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I find on page 77 an item of 7 cents to cover funeral and transportation expenses of a number of Indians. Will the gentleman inform me whether or not that pays all the expenses of the funeral of these Indians? [Laughter.]

The gentleman having answered that question, I would like to ask him another. How many Indians did the 7 cents bury?

Mr. TAWNEY. That depends upon the breed of Indians they were.

Mr. BUTLER. I am satisfied with the answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the reading of the bill, from line 7 on page 69, down to the bottom of page 81, be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the chairman of the committee about an item which I find on page 72, in line 15, relative to the capture of Jefferson Davis. I do not know when that late capture was made. It seems that Jefferson Davis has lately been captured.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, that item was the cause of a great deal of excitement on the other side of the House this afternoon when the bill was first read. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] since that time has obtained full and complete information from a letter sent to the Committee on Appropriations by the Secretary of the Treasury on that subject. The Congress of the United States in 1868 appropriated $100,000 and authorized the President of the United States to expend that amount of money in paying or rewarding men who participated in the capture of Jefferson Davis.

When we passed the covering-in act two years ago, which requires the payment into the Treasury of all unexpended balances, there was an unexpended balance of this appropriation of $100,000, made away back in 1868, for this purpose. Under that act that balance was paid into the Treasury of the United States. Recently a constituent of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY], he having previously supposed that his right to participate in the distribution of the reward had expired by limitation, was informed by his Member of Congress, after examination, that such was not the fact, and, at the instance of the gentleman from Wisconsin, the Secretary of the Treasurer certified, after full investigation and proof, that this man was one of the three participants in that capture who had not been rewarded. After ascertaining that fact he sent his claim to Congress as an audited claim. That is all I know about it. If it were not for the fact that the balance had not been turned into the Treasury of the United States as a result of the action of Congress on the sundry civil appropriation bill in the closing days of the Sixtieth Congress, this amount would have been paid to this man out of the balance unexpended.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection, of course, to this item, and from what I have seen from the correspondence it seems to be perfectly correct; but the bill did not give the name of the party to whom the money was to be paid, and a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury does give his name, and I am going to ask unanimous consent that the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury may be published in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, because that explains the matter fully.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to insert the letter to which he refers as a part of his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 20, 1911.

Hon. J. A. TAWNEY,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In reply to your telegram of February 17, relative to audited claim No. 12248 for $293 in favor of John T. Smith, alias John Wagner, for capture of Jefferson Davis, contained in House Document No. 1368, page 15, I have the honor to advise you that the Auditor for the War Department states that this claim is for a portion of the reward of $100,000 offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jefferson Davis under the act of Congress of July 27, 1865 (15 Stat., 400), this being one of three cases remaining unpaid of those who took part in the capture and who are entitled to participate in the distribution of this reward, no application ever having been made heretofore by this claimant.

The auditor further states that three comrades of this claimant testify that John T. Smith and John Wagner are one and the same person; and it appears that John T. Smith, alias John Wagner, is drawing a pension under certificate No. 1157572; also that this claim was originally presented to his office by Hon. WILLIAM J. CARY of the House of Representatives, who stated that the claimant had an excellent record; that he had not sooner applied for payment because he was under the impression that his claim was barred by the statute of limitations, and that a copy of his honorable discharge was in his [Mr. CARY'S] possession. Copies of Mr. Cary's letter and of the affidavits of Lieut. O. P. Clinton and Corpl. E. H. Stuart, of claimant's regiment and company, as to his identity and his presence at the capture are inclosed for your information.

The papers in claimant's pension case disclose the fact that he enlisted when under age under an assumed name for fear of parental disapproval, and that his sisters and friends corresponded with him under the name of John Wagner throughout the war.

The act of Congress above cited appropriated the sum of $100,000 as a reward for the capture of Jefferson Davis, to be paid to the officers and enlisted men named therein, including the claimant, and to certain other members of regiments present at the capture whose names are unknown, or to their heirs, in proportion to the monthly pay to which they were severally entitled according to law.

This appropriation has remained available since the passage of the act for the specific payments authorized therein, being drawn upon from time to time as claims were presented and allowed until June 30, 1909, when the balance thereof, amounting to $1,210.48, was carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 10 of the sundry civil act of March 4, 1909 (35 Stat., 1027), which provided that all unexpended balances remaining upon the books of the Treasury on July 1, 1904, should be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury.

The claim has now been allowed by the Auditor for the War Department under the provisions of the act of July 7, 1884 (23 Stat., 254), authorizing the allowance of claims under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund.

Respectfully, FRANKLIN MACVEAGH, Secretary.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no further objection, because it appeared to me as rather a strange item when I saw in the bill that Mr. Davis had lately been captured, and I thought it well that we have some explanation as to why Mr. Davis was being paraded around at this late day.

Mr. DAWSON. There is no doubt existing anywhere that he was captured, is there?

Mr. SISSON. None in the world.

Mr. TAWNEY. I trust the gentlemen of the House will now give attention to the request for unanimous consent, as we desire to close this bill if possible.

Mr. SISSON. I want to state to the gentleman I did not think there was any doubt about his being captured and above all things about a capture that was as much talked about at that particular time, and I thought it strange that any man living on earth would have waited this long to get his money, especially if he belonged to the party of the gentleman who made the inquiry. Republicans are usually not so long in getting their money.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of getting some information before consent is given to the unanimous consent, I notice, beginning on page 76, a number of items for the Indian Service, including an item for telegraphing, amounting to $22,418, and another item for telegraphing amounting to $3,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Read the whole item and the gentleman will see it includes transportation and a good many items.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; there are a number of these items. The Indian appropriation bill gave the Indian Service everything they asked on these matters and——

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, the gentleman from Kansas will pardon me, but he certainly realizes and knows that in the administration of the affairs of the Indians and of all the departments it happens frequently that accounts are not sent in for settlement and payment until the appropriation has elapsed. Now, that account is audited and the appropriation made for the year, the fiscal year in which the obligation was created, but there is no money available for the payment of that account.

And, therefore, under the statutes the heads of the departments are required to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Treasury to certify to Congress, all audited accounts of that kind, and that is how these accounts come here. They are not claims. They are simply accounts that were not paid out of appropriations for the years in which the indebtedness occurred because of the lapse of the appropriation.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Indian Department had ample opportunity to present this to the Committee on Indian Affairs for consideration in the bill providing for the year 1910.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Indian Bureau did not have the information itself. Why, in some of these cases the claimants, or the persons to whom the money is due, will not present the account for two or three years. The department is not to blame if the persons to whom the money is due fail to present their accounts, and it is only when the accounts are presented——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It does not necessarily mean that these deficiencies call for any additional appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Money that would otherwise be used to meet these accounts is returned into the Treasury by reason of the lapse of the appropriation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman explain one item, in line 16 on page 76, which reads:

For telegraphing, transportation, and so forth, of Indian supplies, 1910, $22,000.

I understand what telegraphing is and what transportation is, but what do they mean by "and so forth" there, and what part of the $22,000 is to pay for that?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is for advertising and sundry expenses. When they send in the audited claims they do not enumerate all the items involving small amounts of money.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not remember to have seen that in any other bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will look at the document that is referred to in that paragraph, he will obtain a full itemized statement of every item that goes to make up that $20,000, but the gentleman must realize that it would not be fair to the House to describe every little item in the appropriation act. For that reason we refer to the document which conveys all the details of the appropriation. Now, Mr. Speaker, before submitting the request, I am informed that while I was out this evening for a few moments a certain request was made. If the Chair will submit the request now, I will recur.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state it. The gentleman from Minnesota asked unanimous consent that further reading of the bill, from line 7, page 69, down to and including line 25, on page 81, be dispensed with.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I notice that on page 81, among claims allowed by the Auditor for the Post Office Department, there is an item in line 7 of $257, for indemnity for losses by registered mail. I want to ask the chairman of the committee under what circumstances the Government assumes to indemnify anyone for the loss of registered mail?

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the law the department indemnifies the senders of registered mail up to $50; formerly it was $45.

Mr. COVINGTON. And this claim has been audited according to the existing law?

Mr. STAFFORD. These are several claims where the appropriation was not sufficient to pay the claims of indemnity that year.

Mr. MACON. I want to ask the gentleman if all of these items have been audited.

Mr. TAWNEY. All of them have been audited, and they have all been read once to-day.

Mr. MACON. And they are all authorized by existing law?

Mr. TAWNEY. They are all authorized by existing law.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I would like to offer the following amendment, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Commander Robert E. Peary, for services rendered in the discovery of the North Pole, $10,000.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order upon that. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas reserve the point of order?

Mr. MACON. I make it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to have unanimous consent to ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] to reserve his point of order in order that I may make a statement.

Mr. TAWNEY. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will desist.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, there is no desire on the part of Commander Peary's friends that this award should be made to Commander Peary. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that this paragraph on page 32, which was passed over in my absence without prejudice, be taken up by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to return to the item on page 32. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX], as the Chair recollects, reserved a point of order on the paragraph. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this is an item that has been the subject of international negotiation and also the subject of a message from the President of the United States. The naval gunboat Essex damaged the cable of the Canadian Electric Light Co. near or in the vicinity of Quebec. The House has already passed a bill authorizing the payment of this claim, and the Senate has reported favorably a bill for the same purpose. Now the matter has been taken up again. I have a statement here which says—

Since then we have made all possible efforts through the British Embassy, through the Department of State, but we have never been able to bring the matter to a final conclusion.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. TAWNEY. The matter, I repeat, was made the subject of a message by the President of the United States. I concede that it is not authorized by law, but it is a matter of international comity.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If the gentleman will give me but a moment we can settle it, so far as I am concerned. The explanation has gone far enough, and I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. For salaries, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, of a chief and other employees and for all other necessary expenses of a division in the Treasury Department, which is hereby created, to be known as the Fidelity Division, $25,000, to continue available during the fiscal year 1912. The said Fidelity Division, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall hereafter have charge of all matters pertaining to the bonding of all Government officers, agents, and employees, and of the fidelity fund herein provided for, and custody of the bonds of all such officers, agents, and employees. From and after the 1st day of July, 1911, every officer, agent, and employee of the Government who is now or may hereafter be required by law or Executive order to give bond shall at his option give bond either with good and sufficient sureties or, upon contributing to the fidelity fund the premium or premiums herein authorized, give such bond without sureties, and all such bonds shall run to the United States whether given with or without sureties as above provided: Provided, That this section shall not apply to what are commonly known as contract, or court bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury shall classify all bonded officers, agents, and employees of the Government, and the premium rates per thousand of penalty for the various classes shall be established by him after due consideration of the aggregate penalties of bonds given by such classes between the 1st day of January, 1895, and the 31st day of December next preceding the promulgation of such rates, and the aggregate losses incurred on such bonds during the same period, but in the aggregate the average annual premium per thousand of penalty shall be equal to not less than 175 per cent of the average annual loss incurred per thousand or penalty upon the bonds of all officers, agents, and employees of the United States between the 1st day of January, 1895, and the 31st day of December next preceding the promulgation of such rates: Provided further, That premium rates for officers, agents, and employees of the Post Office Department and the postal service may be based on the penalties of the bonds of such employees and the losses incurred under such bonds, as herein provided, between the 1st day of January, 1905, and the 31st day of December next preceding the promulgation of such rates: And provided further, That, should the moneys to the credit of the fidelity fund, less any outstanding claims, become equal to 1 per cent of the total penalties of all the bonds of those contributing to said fund, the rates may be lowered to such an extent as, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, will suffice to meet the average yearly losses and all expenses of the Fidelity Division. The Fidelity Division shall pay all moneys received for the fidelity fund to the Treasurer of the United States, and all such payments shall be covered into the Treasury by him as miscellaneous receipts, but credited on the books of the Treasury to said fidelity fund. Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall finally determine that any sum is due the United States upon any such bond without sureties, such sum shall at once be charged or debited to said fidelity fund, but such charge or debit shall not operate to release the officer, agent, or employee, but he shall be liable as fully on his bond and otherwise as if no such charge or debit had been made; and any moneys that may thereafter be recovered from such officer, agent, or employee, or from anyone for him, shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts and credited to the fidelity fund. All moneys paid into the Treasury to the credit of the fidelity fund shall be the property of the United States for the purposes above specified, and shall be used like other moneys belonging to the Government, but strict account shall be kept of the amount due said fund. All expenses of said Fidelity Division, including salaries therein, shall be annually estimated and appropriated for, but after July 1, 1912, all sums so expended shall be charged or debited to said fidelity fund. That from and after the 1st day of July, 1911, every officer, agent, or employee of the Government receiving, disbursing, or otherwise handling moneys belonging to the United States, or moneys in the custody of the United States, amounting to $1,000 or more per annum, shall give bond to the United States for the faithful performance of his duty, and, unless otherwise provided by law, the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the amount of the penalties of such bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury shall make all necessary rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this section and may utilize and employ for such purpose the services of such officers, clerks, and other employees in the Treasury Department as he may direct. The Secretary of the Treasury shall, in his annual report to Congress, submit a detailed statement of the credits to said fidelity fund and of all charges or debits against the same for the preceding fiscal year, and the number and aggregate penalties of all bonds without sureties executed hereunder during such year.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this section has already been read, and I ask unanimous consent that the further reading be dispensed with. Then, if any gentleman wishes to make amendments or motions to strike out, he can do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota to two typographical errors, on line 10 and line 17, on page 83.

Mr. TAWNEY. The word "or" on line 10 should be "of," and on line 17 the word at the end of the line should be "loss."

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph can be amended so as to correct those errors. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER] if we could arrange to close the debate by unanimous consent in 30 minutes, 15 minutes to a side?

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. If the gentleman will let the matter go over until to-morrow I think we could make better progress.

Mr. TAWNEY. We are so near the end of the bill now, and the time is so short, and the enrollment of the bill is such an important matter as to the economy of time in the brief space allowed us before the close of this session, when only four days remain, that I would like to dispose of the bill to-night.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. I do not want very much time on the proposition, but I do not know how much time other Members may desire to take, and I would dislike to agree that the debate close in 30 minutes if other gentlemen desire to speak. It is a very important matter.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on the paragraph be closed in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the debate has not fairly begun. The Chair would further suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that there is a typographical error on page 83, line 23. The second word on line 23 should contain a letter "m" instead of an "n."

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; the word should be "claims."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, it will be so modified.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER] is recognized.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Mr. Chairman, it will not take me very long to state my objections to this proposed legislation. I have no interest, direct or indirect, in any bonding company doing business in the United States, or anywhere else, and so far as I know there is not a company doing a surety business in the district that I represent which will be affected in any way by this legislation. But, Mr. Chairman, in days gone by I have had considerable experience in connection with the business of surety companies, and I think I can say that I speak from out my own experience when I express the deliberate judgment that if the Government of the United States, by passing this legislation, now goes into the surety business, the time will come when the Congress will regret it.

As I said earlier in the day, there is no business being engaged in by men in this country at the present time which is of a more hazardous and risky character than that of writing bonds to secure the fidelity and honesty of men in official positions and their undertakings of a contract nature in their dealings with the Government.

There are something like 210,000 fidelity bonds running to the United States given by officers, agents, and employees. There are a great many other bonds running from subemployees to superior officers, but I speak only of those in which the United States is the obligee. The aggregate of the penalties of those 210,000 or 220,000 bonds is the enormous sum of $360,000,000.

This section proposes that we shall appropriate the sum of $25,000 as an initial expense in the organization of a bureau which shall manage the bonding business for the Government of the United States, in which it proposes to assume a risk amounting to $360,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If this risk were called suddenly, what would it mean?

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. It would mean bankruptcy, I suppose, if it were called suddenly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell us what amount of premiums would justify this liability of $360,000,000 which the Government apparently would assume under this system?

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. I am not going into those figures. I am not an insurance actuary.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. What would happen to the bonding companies if this $360,000,000 of liability should be called?

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. I am not arguing that it is probable that this enormous liability will ever be incurred at one time under either the present or the proposed system. In the last analysis, Mr. Chairman, the thing amounts to just this: We propose to reduce the salary of every man who is working for the Government, and then, after having reduced his salary, we propose that the Government itself shall assume all the risk of his personal honesty and his fidelity to his employer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There ought to be some understanding about the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are only one or two gentlemen who wish to be heard.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I know; but it was proposed to close this debate at 12 o'clock.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. There was no agreement of that kind. Give me five minutes, then.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has just announced that he does not care for more than five minutes.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. I should like to have 10 minutes. I do not want to prolong the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object. I understand the gentleman will be satisfied with five minutes.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. I will not be satisfied with five minutes. I am sure I can conclude inside of 10 minutes.

Mr. HILL. It is too late. I was so informed a few minutes ago, when I asked to be allowed to make a statement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for five minutes, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. I will not object to five minutes. I will object to 10.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Mr. Chairman, in five minutes it is of course difficult to cover very much of a question of this kind. I simply want to add to what I have said on that branch of the proposition—that it does seem to me to be false economy for us to assume this enormous risk because the Government of the United States, while it proposes to pay the losses out of the reduction of salaries by way of assessments made upon employees and officers of the Government, will, nevertheless, be liable for the entire penalty of these bonds, to the extent of all the losses that may occur upon them. So there is no need of dealing in figures as to what losses have been made in the last few years, or what they may be in the future. We propose to make the Government responsible hereafter, so that we are practically saying that in the future we will do what this Government has never done in the past—take these employees, officers, and agents into its employ without any security whatever to protect the Government in the performance of their duties.

Now, I want to refer to another paragraph in this section which raises the strongest possible objection to this proposed legislation. There is a proviso that this section shall not apply to what are commonly known as contract or court bonds. We might as well be practical about this thing. Everybody who has given the subject any attention knows perfectly well that the great bonding companies have made some money out of the fidelity bonds running to the Government. They have been able to get prices on those which, while lower than prices charged to persons in a fiduciary capacity in private life, have yielded profits to the great surety companies. And they have been willing to continue in the business of writing all kinds of bonds running to the Government because of the prestige which the Government of the United States as a patron and customer has given to the companies, despite the fact that the contract business, the business of writing bonds to secure the execution of contracts, has been done at an enormous loss. I know that one company, situated in the city of Baltimore, in less than 10 years, has received $301,000 in premiums on contract bonds, and has paid out to the Government of the United States for losses $910,000 in the same length of time.

Now, I say we should be practical. What is going to happen? You put this law into operation and take away from the surety companies the fidelity business in which they can make living profits and they are going to refuse to write the contract bonds, and the Government of the United States will be forced to go back to the antiquated and old-fashioned system of taking individual sureties upon every contract bond running to the Government of the United States.

Why, this little thing of fidelity bonds is a picayune matter compared with the danger that you are running into of being required to accept individual sureties on all your contract bonds. Is not that a serious matter? In 1894, when this Congress passed a law permitting surety companies to write bonds of this character, the Secretary of the Treasury reported to Congress that we had upon our books $35,000,000 of uncollected and uncollectible judgments against individuals upon surety bonds of this character—contract and fidelity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman conclude in five minutes?

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. At that time this argument of the Secretary of the Treasury showing our dealings with individuals as sureties was sufficient to impress upon this Congress the necessity of a change, and the law making it possible to get surety companies on bonds was enacted. We propose deliberately now to repeal that law, in effect, by driving the insurance companies away from the contract business and by reducing the price of fidelity business to such an extent that no surety company will enter the field. If it was a good thing to take surety companies in 1894, when they were weak and inexperienced, when they did not know what this business meant, I think it must be a bad thing to drive them out of the field and make it impossible for the Government to have the benefit of their security now, 17 years later.

The gentlemen complain of the fact that the surety companies have charged high prices. The fact is that the prices charged as premiums on fidelity bonds to-day by the surety companies average as low as they were before this legislation had its inception in the special session of 1909. The fact is that that law which we passed at the tariff session in 1909 has accomplished the purpose which gentlemen on the other side then said they desired, and that was to give some power to the Government over the prices that the surety companies might charge.

I will tell you, if you want to know, how you can go a little farther in the same direction and give your employees and your officers the benefit of better prices without embarking the Government of the United States into this tremendously risky business of writing bonds. You put into the act of 1894 a provision that the Government might accept bonds written by surety companies incorporated under the laws of the United States or of any State in the Union. If you will strike out of that law the words "incorporated under the laws of the United States or of any State in the Union," you will do more than any other act could do in giving a better, bigger, and stronger competition, which would result in lower premiums upon this same class of bonds you are striking at now. There are surety companies all over the world. Great Britain has strong companies. The Dominion of Canada has strong companies. They are doing business in the American field. They are after the business, and they want the Government business, and the prestige and advertisement of the Government business are such that if these foreigners could come into this field and bid against the American companies for the business the rates would go down below the cut rates of 1907 and 1908. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that rather than go hastily into this business of creating a new department of the Government for the purpose of taking care of this insurance business we might better overhaul that law and make more effective the law of 1909 that the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Minnesota were so eloquent in defending and so successful in obtaining two years ago. I have heard these gentlemen, especially the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], upon whom eulogies as the watchdog of the Treasury have been delivered to-night, inveigh here time after time during my short service against the proposition that we should be constantly creating new bureaus in the executive departments of the Government, and I am sorry to see him celebrate his passing from the House by the attempt to foist upon the United States Government a bureau, with an appropriation of $25,000 to start with—and nobody knows how much will follow in the years to come—and to embark that bureau into the business of writing bonds to the extent of $360,000,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say only a very few words in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER]. He says that the bonds are for penalties of $300,000,000 and wants to know what will become of us if they all mature at the same time. I would like to know what would become of the bonding companies, with their thirty-five or thirty-six millions of dollars of capital and surplus, if the whole $300,000,000 should fall due at the same time?

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. If the gentleman will pardon me, he should remember that I was not guilty of asking that question. That was asked by my colleague, the gentleman from Philadelphia.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I know, but the gentleman assumed that there were $300,000,000 of penalties, and it was an awful liability for this Government to undertake. If it fell due at the same time it would be quite as fatal to his $35,000,000 surety companies as to the Government of the United States.

He says we will have to go back to private sureties again. Well, godspeed the day when we do, if we can not get something better than we have been getting from the surety companies. I predicted when the actuaries undertook the work that it would appear that the private sureties had paid a greater percentage of their losses than have these bonding companies, and it appeared from the investigation covering 15 years that the private sureties had paid 30 per cent more of their losses than the surety companies. He said that if it was a good thing to take these bonding companies when we started, many years ago, why not now? We never knew it was a good thing to take their bonds. We thought it was a good thing to try their bonds, and we have tried them, and found that after extorting six times as much from Government employees as they have paid over to us, outside of the Post Office Department, and over four times as much in the Post Office Department, they were then beating us out of two-thirds of what was due us. If any man is opposed to trusts in this world I do not see how he can stand here and defend allowing the Government employees to be robbed of the premiums and then the Government to be robbed of the amounts due or the bonds when they fall due.

We do not object so much to the amount of the premium as we object to the fact that these companies will not pay if they lose. We want the Government to recover the money that is due it and we will have to devise some scheme by which the Government can get this money. Now we are putting upon these employees not an additional burden, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but we are proposing to put upon them a less premium than is put upon them by these companies. We are not reducing their salaries. We are increasing the salaries of all of them by charging a lower premium than the bonding companies charge, and then we are paying 100 cents on the dollar of the Government's obligation and not one-third as they have been doing.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Just there as the gentleman refers to the fact, and to have the record right, is it not true that the Government of the United States does not have a single uncollectible judgment against any of these bonding companies?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is true; when companies have failed it is not necessary——

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Have you a claim?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If they have failed, there is no use in getting a judgment which would be utterly worthless.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. How much would that amount to?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I can not give the exact figures.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER. Is it not also true that in 1894 we had thirty-five millions of uncollectible judgments against individuals?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Fidelity bonds; no. The gentleman adroitly picks the bonds that are not here in question, but contract bonds, and the like; there never was such an amount of fidelity bonds due the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I could tell the gentleman of one fidelity bond that was paid to the Government within the last six months.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And that company is bankrupt.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true, and it is because of the 4,000 people who had their money in that company that I do not want to see this injustice done to them.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I can not yield the gentleman all my time——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know the company was made to pay——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I will answer any questions, but he must not take up all of my time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will answer this question. He has referred to one company that is bankrupt, and that is because it has endeavored to pay its obligations to the Government, and had to go to the wall——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That was not the only reason, but it was forced into the hands of a receiver before it went to the wall.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has not the receivership actually paid to the Government——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I must insist, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I ask for two more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Under this provision we find that it will greatly reduce the premiums paid by the Government employees and take them out of the clutches of this combine of 17 companies, and at the same time we will pay to the Government three times as much upon its losses as it now receives. For these reasons the commission, composed of three Senators and three Members of the House, after two years of effort, has reported this measure in the confident belief that it will be successful if tried.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER), there were—ayes 37, noes 66.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CURRIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 32967, the general deficiency bill, and had instructed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with a recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no request. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAWNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid upon the table.

Mr. GARRETT. I hope the gentleman does not care to press that resolution to-night.

Mr. TILSON. I understand there is no objection to it. Every member of the Committee on Military Affairs is in favor of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has it the unanimous consent of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] has been considered.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman withdrew.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I move the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] 20 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. I understand there is no objection to it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TILSON. If there is any objection to my motion, I certainly will withdraw it.

L. Gaines $63, to defray the expenses of the burial, etc., of said John W. Williams.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1911.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings and was interrupted by Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I insist on the Secretary reading the entire Journal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary is reading the Journal in full. He will proceed so to do.

Mr. STONE. I should like to inquire if he is reading it in full.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Petitions which have been presented do not appear in the Journal in full, but there is simply an annotation showing that they were presented, and that annotation the Secretary is reading. A petition does not appear in full in the Journal of course.

Mr. STONE. When the Secretary reads "as follows" and turns over a sheet without reading it, I should like to know what that sheet contains.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was a roll call.

Mr. STONE. Is not a roll call a part of the Journal?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a part of the Journal. If the Senator from Missouri desires that the Secretary, in each instance, shall read the roll call, the Secretary, will do so.

Mr. STONE. Well, for the present at least.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the Journal.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BROWN. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri gave notice of his purpose to have the Journal read. However, he is here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator objects. The Secretary will continue the reading of the Journal.

The reading of the Journal was resumed and concluded, and it was approved.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GLOUCESTER, MASS., January 27, 1911.

Whereas the commission appointed by the Governments of the United States and Canada to draw up an agreement of reciprocity between the two countries has reported to Congress; and

Whereas said agreement puts on the free list fish of all kinds, fresh, frozen, packed in ice, salted, or preserved in any form, with some few exceptions, which means the destruction of the fishing industry in Gloucester, an industry which has continued from 1623 to the present time; and

Whereas the President of the United States recommended the appointment of a tariff commission to investigate the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, which is a fair and just way to get at the facts, and which for some reason has not been acted upon; and

Whereas it is unfair to adopt such measures without a hearing, thereby destroying an important industry, which has lasted so long and which on account of the nature of its business has fitted men who have always been ready to come to their country's aid in time of war; and

Whereas a great many articles which enter into the manufacture and production of our fish products are highly protected, and because the profit on our fish products is too small to permit us to compete with our English neighbors if this agreement is carried out, inasmuch as labor costs are so much lower in Canada than in the United States, and also because of the nearness of the fishing grounds to Canada: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the municipal council, representing the people of Gloucester, believing that this action will be positively ruinous to the fishing industry and to the city of Gloucester as a whole, do hereby protest against this action, feeling that it is unfair to blot out an industry which has played such an important part in our country's welfare, and we most respectfully urge that the United States Government use all honorable means to prevent such a course of action; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Senators of this Commonwealth, our Representative in Congress and the other Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth, requesting them to use their best endeavors to defeat any action which will ruin the oldest industry in the history of the United States.

ISAAC PATCH, Mayor.
C. H. BARRETT,
SAM'L MONTGOMERY,
A. N. DONAHOE,
GEO. E. MERCHANT,
Aldermen, Municipal Council of Gloucester, Mass.

In municipal council, January 27, 1911, unanimously adopted.
A true copy.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 32957. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1911 and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand that it is the purpose of the Senate immediately after the close of the morning business to proceed to the consideration of the Lorimer case, and in as much as many Senators have spoken for hours and days upon the subject and as there are many here who have not spoken at all, and as the vote will be had at 1.30 this afternoon, I am going to ask unanimous consent that in the consideration of and argument upon the resolution, no Senator shall speak to exceed 15 minutes until all those who desire to speak upon the subject have been heard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the debate has occupied a great many weeks and even months. There has been ample opportunity for Senators to speak. I shall be constrained to object to any such rule. I say further that the Senator knows this is also in accordance with the convictions that I have heretofore expressed in similar debates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana objects. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCUMBER. I insist that we proceed with the calendar. Then, if no one is to speak to-day, and no one to be allowed to speak but one or two Senators upon this proposition, it seems to me that we ought to go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to ask what order of business the Senate is now on?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Under what order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not under anything. He is on the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply desired to know what the order is so as to see whether we are going to have morning business or whether we are not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair had announced that the calendar under Rule VIII was in order. The Senator from Oklahoma then asked the floor, and he has the floor.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in speaking upon this matter, I wish first of all to say that I am sincerely sorry for WILLIAM LORIMER. I am sorry for him, whether his title be held valid by the Senate of the United States or whether it be not. I am sorry for him because he has demonstrated on this floor that he has intellectual and oratorical qualities of the first magnitude, and he has demonstrated more, from the story of his life, that he has had a kind and magnanimous heart; but there is nothing that can ever remove the stain upon the record of his election or relieve the stigma of this record, because the evidence is convincing that his election to this body was procured by corrupt practices, and must always remain a painful memory to him and to his friends. For four hours he addressed this body in a speech of wonderful eloquence and power—an appeal that moved the hearts of all. The most remarkable thing of all in that speech was that he refrained from any reference to the evidence in the case and devoted himself to other questions which were immaterial to the point at issue while vehemently assuring the Senate of his innocence.

What are we to believe as to these assurances? In answer to a suggestion made to me I sent telegrams to three persons referred to by Mr. LORIMER, asking as to the accuracy of his references to them. One confirmed Mr. LORIMER's reference to him, one partly denied, but the third, the governor of Illinois, Charles S. Deneen, vigorously denied the truth of Mr. LORIMER's statements. I hold in my hand a telegram from the governor of the State of Illinois denying in serial order the statements made by Mr. LORIMER with regard to the governor of Illinois. Mr. LORIMER had the opportunity of appearing before a committee of this body. Why did he not appear before this committee investigating the question of whether or not he was aware of corrupt practices in the matter of his election?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. OWEN. I can not now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I will not ask the Senator to yield; but I will appeal to the Presiding Officer on a question of privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. HEYBURN. When a Senator states on this floor that he has a telegram containing certain facts and a member of the committee who is, by implication, charged with having misconducted this investigation rises for the purpose of asking that that telegram or the contents of it be made public, the Senator has no right to withhold it. The Senator has passed on to another subject without telling what is in that telegram.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that is not a question of privilege to be decided by the Chair.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, it is in the record.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma will proceed.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, as I had fully intended, the telegram will be read immediately to the Senate of the United States to show that the governor of the State of Illinois denies the truth of what Mr. LORIMER alleges on the floor of the Senate to be true. He appeared as a witness before this body, not under oath; he appeared as a witness where he can not be held to account; and he makes statements that are denied by the governor of his own State. I read the telegram of the governor of Illinois:

STATE CAPITOL,
Springfield, Ill., February 24, 1911.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

As requested in your telegram, I transmit you herewith published statements made by me concerning Senator LORIMER's speeches.

The published statement made May 29, 1910, he first answers, which I will put into the RECORD without reading.

Mr. HEYBURN. I object to it going into the RECORD without reading.

Mr. OWEN. I will read it in full.

Published statement made May 29, 1910:

"Very meager reports of Senator LORIMER's speech have been given out. I understand that he charges that I entered into a conspiracy with the Chicago Tribune to publish the confession of Representative White. This charge is without any foundation in fact. The facts are as follows: About midnight of the day before the story was published a representative of the Chicago Tribune met me at the Union League Club and informed me that he had been waiting two hours to see me; that the editor of the Tribune was exceedingly anxious to interview me about a matter of very great importance, and that they would have to go to press within a few minutes. Accordingly I went with him to the Tribune office, which was near by.

"A statement was there made to me of Mr. White's confession, and an interview was requested. A very brief interview was given at once on the statement, in which I stated, in substance, that a full examination should be made of the statements contained in the confession and expressed no opinion regarding the truth of the charges. Mr. White's confession was in type and was on the press when I arrived at the Tribune office, and this was the first intimation I had that Mr. White had confessed or was in any way implicated in the charges of bribery.

"Regarding the deadlock over the senatorship, after the primaries I stood for the election of Senator Hopkins and did not know that Senator LORIMER and Mr. Shurtleff and their friends were against him until a minority of Republican members who were in harmony with Senator LORIMER and Speaker Shurtleff effected an organization of the house of representatives with the aid of the Democratic members. After the deadlock had existed some time Senator LORIMER called upon me repeatedly. I had assumed from the conversations we had at these times that it was entirely with a view to effecting a reconciliation between Republican factions, and notwithstanding that I felt I had suffered unjustly by reason of attacks made upon me by him and his friends in the preceding legislature, the preceding primaries, the preceding election, the preceding organization of the house, and in the effort to unseat me and seat my opponent as governor, I felt that I should lay aside all personal feeling and interest in the hope of bringing about harmony in the party.

"Senator LORIMER informed me that his friends would, under no circumstances, vote for Senator Hopkins, and, as it was impossible to elect a Senator by Republican votes without the votes of his friends, I stated that they should go into a Republican caucus to select a candidate who could be sure of the majority vote in the caucus, and thereafter the full vote of the party in his election to the senatorship.

"This was the view taken by Republicans throughout the State, and a number of names had been mentioned in this connection by friends of various candidates—Col. LOWDEN, Congressman MCKINLEY, A. C. Bartlett, W. A. RODENBERG, and a number of others, among them Mr. West. Senator LORIMER was opposed to the plan of nominating by caucus. Later I was informed by him and his friends that I could be elected Senator. I refused absolutely to consider it. Nevertheless, shortly before his election an effort was made by him and his friends in the general assembly to elect me. I called together in my office Republicans who had supported me in the Senate and who had gone into a Republican caucus in the house and stated to them that this movement was without my approval, and that I would not accept the office if elected.

"Shortly before Senator LORIMER was elected and after the deadlock had dragged on for months, it became apparent that he was a candidate. A number of my friends, whom he mentions in his speech, called upon me, and I advised them strongly against voting for him even though he could get a minority of the Republicans to aid the Democrats in electing him. All of these facts were published as the contest went on and were at that time familiar to the public.

"While I am surprised at the character of the statements made by Senator LORIMER, I am at a loss to know the positive relation they bear to the charge now under investigation, that his election to the United States Senate was procured by means of bribery."

Published statement made February 23, 1911:

"I have only such meager information regarding the speech made by Senator LORIMER to-day as appeared in the afternoon editions of the Springfield papers. I notice, however, that he followed the course which I have often observed followed by men charged with serious offenses in Cook County when I was State attorney there, of trying to escape an explanation of the facts against him by making charges against men who are not on trial. He has followed the course of Mr. Erbstein, one of the attorneys for Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne, who was recently indicted and tried in the criminal courts of Cook County for jury bribing, and who refrained from going on the witness stand to testify under oath, where he could be cross-examined, and instead made a speech to the jury where his statements were not subject to the rules of cross-examination.

"Mr. LORIMER states—

I would like to call the attention of the Senate to this. Mr. President, here comes a categorical denial by the governor of Illinois of the statements made by Mr. LORIMER on this floor. It goes to the credibility of Mr. LORIMER—

"1. That I consented to become a candidate for Senator, and then immediately withdrew. This is not true"—

Says the governor of Illinois—

"I never gave my consent to him or anybody else to become a candidate, but on the contrary refused to do so, and stated to everyone who spoke to me upon the subject that I refused to become a candidate and would not accept the office if elected.

"2. He charges that Edward Shurtleff became speaker because I threatened to deprive representatives of patronage should they vote for him, and that I tried to elect one of my friends as speaker. Neither of these charges is true. I threatened no one with taking patronage from him, nor did I ask any member to vote for any particular person for speaker. I urged the Republicans to go into a Republican caucus and abide by the will of majority as expressed there, and had Mr. Shurtleff been selected as Republican candidate for speaker in a Republican caucus any man who would have followed my advice would have supported him.

The same situation arose here last month at the beginning of the present session of the general assembly. Mr. Shurtleff and his friends again refused to go into the regular Republican caucus. The other 64 Republicans, most of whom were my friends, went into the caucus, and there selected Mr. Charles Adkins as Republican candidate. I urged the Republicans to go into this caucus and abide by its decision, but did not indicate to any Republican any preference for speaker. Immediately after Mr. Adkins had been chosen for speaker it appeared that Mr. Shurtleff and his friends, who were very hostile to me and were opposed to the Republican platform, would be given conspicuous places and would in fact dominate the house organization. Notwithstanding this was apparent, every one of the 64 members who went into the caucus voted for Mr. Adkins for speaker because he was the caucus nominee.

"3. Senator LORIMER states that I could have elected Mr. Hopkins Senator at any time. In view of the fact that he charges in the same breath that I could not elect a speaker, this statement falls by its own weight and needs no further refutation.

"4. He states that Mr. Shurtleff was one of Mr. Hopkins's managers. This will be news in Illinois.

"5. He has added to the list of candidates whom he claimed in his speech of May 29, 1910, that he submitted to me, Mr. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS. My answer, made on May 29, the day after Mr. LORIMER'S speech in the Senate, stands now as to Mr. FOSS, also."

I call the attention of the Senate that this is the sixth categorical denial of the truth of the statements made by Mr. LORIMER on the floor of the Senate.

"6. He states: 'I urged him (Deneen) to become a candidate, telling him I believed he would reunite our party, torn asunder by factional strife.' The proposal to elect me United States Senator was not by Republican votes alone, but I was assured by him that I would get practically the entire Democratic vote in the house. No one who is at all familiar with the situation but knows that the majority of the Republicans were at all times for Senator Hopkins, and would not have voted for me had I become a candidate, or for anyone else; and the only hope of electing anybody but Senator Hopkins lay in securing a large Democratic support. No Democrat offered me such support, and the assurances of that vote came directly from Senator LORIMER, who appeared even at that time to have authority to speak for the Democrats in this matter.

"7. I notice that he gives reasons why the Democrats would support him. I have looked in vain in his speech for reasons why they would support me or any other Republican whom he named in his speech to-day, none of whom could have gotten a majority of the Republicans, because the majority felt bound by the primary vote to vote for Senator Hopkins. The truth is, the bipartisan coalition, which reached its climax in the election of Senator LORIMER, was formed in the general assembly which preceded this election, for the purpose of defeating me. To injure me it made a spurious investigation of our State institutions; it made corrupt alliances with certain interests."—

The governor of Illinois says it made corrupt alliances. Who made corrupt alliances? This Democratic coalition of Republicans and Democrats of the Illinois Legislature did. "It made corrupt alliances with certain interests," says the governor of Illinois—

"that could not use me to secure my defeat in the primaries and got a very influential wing of the Democratic Party to unite with it in this effort. It was the understanding, then, that if the effort to defeat me at the primaries failed the Republican members of this bipartisan coalition would in turn join with the Democrats to defeat me at the polls, a program which was followed to the letter."

I remind the Senate that Senator LORIMER pointed out the small vote which Gov. Deneen got in Illinois, and the governor explains it by the treachery of the Republicans who were engaged in this coalition with the Democrats.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. A corrupt coalition.

Mr. OWEN. A corrupt coalition.

"After the election it became apparent that the Republican wing of this bipartisan coalition would not go into a Republican caucus upon the speakership, where they would be in a hopeless minority, and before the general assembly it became apparent also that they would join with the Democrats to elect a speaker and organize the house of representatives upon bipartisan lines. This was done, and Mr. Shurtleff was elected speaker. It was understood that the first fruits of this coalition would be to unseat me as governor, and the public is familiar with the long-drawn-out contest where the plan was to unseat me without counting votes, upon trumped-up, general charges affecting every county in the State. Finally, the contest committee ruled that they would have to file specifications, when the whole rotten fabric of false accusation dissolved and disappeared.

"It was after this that I was tendered the nomination for the Senatorship by men who had waged this unrelenting warfare against me for so long a time. Manifestly the only purpose of such a proposal from such a source was to get me out of the governor's chair, where I stood in the way of their plans, and leave to this bipartisan combination the reuniting of the Republican Party, torn asunder by factional strife."

"What interest," says the governor of Illinois—

the 53 Democrats who voted for Senator LORIMER had in the "reconciliation of Republican factions torn asunder by factional strife" does not yet appear.

The governor closes his telegram with this interesting question:

But what does all this have to do with the charges or the evidence that Mr. LORIMER was elected by the corrupt use of money?

CHARLES S. DENEEN.

What are we to believe is the truth? What will the country believe is the truth? Mr. LORIMER, when this evidence had been piled up mountain high, when the evidence showed that 10 men, at least, had been corrupted, when the evidence showed that three additional members had dishonorable and corrupt proposals made to them, did not appear under oath before the committee of this honorable body charged with the duty of investigating this question, and did not there on his oath as a man deny the truth of the charge made that his election was procured by corrupt practices.

Mr. President, the committee of the Senate was charged by the resolution of the Senate of June 20, 1910, with the duty "to report to the Senate whether in the election of said WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from said State of Illinois there were used corrupt methods or practices in this election." The report speaks for itself. The committee does not report whether there were such corrupt practices, and does not abstract the testimony so as to make it easily intelligible. The committee reports, on the contrary, that "the title of Mr. LORIMER to a seat in the Senate has not been shown to be invalid by the use or employment of corrupt methods or practices," which they were not directed to do.

Mr. President, this is not merely the trial of an individual. This is not a question of determining merely the validity of a title to a seat in this body. It goes far beyond that question. It is a question of a great public policy. It is a question of determining by our conduct in this case whether we shall pursue a policy which shall promote corruption and bribery in this Republic, or whether we shall put an iron hand upon corruption in the election of Senators and set an example of nobility and virtue before the entire country.

I took issue with the report of the committee at the first reasonable opportunity, on the 9th of January, for the reason that I had made all of my arrangements to be absent for two or three weeks in Oklahoma, and I did not want this matter determined without putting upon the record my protest at least against an unwise report, which I thought might lead to an unwise decision in this body.

I regretted to find myself differing with the committee. The members of the committee I respect. A number of them are warm personal friends. I can easily understand how a committee in dealing with such a mass of evidence might arrive at an erroneous conclusion, probably leaving to some of the members the task of digesting the volume of evidence, perhaps leaving to some member the task of writing a report, but whatever the cause I will not give my assent to the doctrine which they have laid down, both because the doctrine itself is unsound and because their conclusion from the evidence, in my judgment, is in great error.

I read this evidence of over 700 pages carefully and patiently digested it.

This evidence shows, Mr. President, that Holstlaw in Chicago June 16, 1909, received $2,500 in cash and deposited it. The proof is clear. That White received a thousand dollars in Chicago and received afterwards $900 in St. Louis. He accounts for it. The evidence shows that Beckemeyer and Link received a thousand dollars each at the same time and place and $900 at the same time and place as the other conspirators did. And so one, two, three, four of these conspirators show that they confessed that they received the cash and how it was deposited or used and six others are proven equally guilty in my opinion. The proof is complete. The evidence is clear.

Three others—Luke, Clark, and Shephard—are circumstantially shown to have received the same amount of bribe money, to wit, $1,000 each, in the Southern Hotel, St. Louis, Mo., on June 21, 1909, and $900 each on July 15, 1909, at the Southern Hotel, St. Louis, as did Beckemeyer and Link.

Three others swore to attempts to bribe them.

I presented an abstract of this evidence in my remarks January 9, 1911. I will not now repeat it. It is not necessary to repeat it. The evidence speaks for itself. Page by page were recited by me showing where this evidence could be found in the printed record, of which I then had no index, and upon that evidence there can be no doubt that corrupt practices did take place in a wholesale fashion.

The committee did not go into the jack pot, as I thought they ought to have done. The jack-pot combination of the Illinois Legislature was evidently strong enough and had in it enough of Republicans and of Democrats to control legislation in that body, or to defeat legislation in that body, and it is perfectly obvious that the powers of the jack-pot combination and conspiracy, this bipartisan thieving, knavish combination of that Illinois Legislature, was strong enough to elect any man who would make terms with it or to elect any man whose friends would make terms with it.

The committee did not think it wise, did not think itself justified in going into that evidence and finding out what this jack pot was, and what its strength was. I think it ought still to be done. I think that the Senate should not rest content until it had dug up the jack pot of Illinois by the roots. The time of jack-pot control of the legislative power of this country and of the governing powers of this country must end, or the Republic itself does not deserve as a Government to live, and can not long endure. It will fall as Rome did from that identical cause.

I call your attention to the evidence of the control of the governing powers in this country by these evil and sinister forces. Look at the Pacific coast, and the control of that great and splendid metropolis of San Francisco, and its municipal powers by the corrupt combination of Democrats and Republicans, which was disclosed by Francis Heney. Look at the control of Denver, Colo., by the corrupt combination of Democratic and Republican thieves, as disclosed by Ben Lindsey in the Beast and the Jungle. Look at St. Louis and the control of the governing powers of that great metropolis of the Mississippi Valley by the thieves banded together to steal the governing powers of that municipality for private profit and municipal graft, which was disclosed to the wondering eyes of honest citizens by Joseph W. Folk, who could neither be bribed nor bullied nor threatened from the discharge of his honest duties as an officer. Look at the control for years of Pittsburg by municipal thieves, and the final disclosure there by the private enterprise of citizens who employed for long periods of time experts, detectives, putting craft against craft, and finally disclosing a nest of thieves of bipartisans, indicting finally in one grand coup 116 criminals in the governing business, members of the municipal council, bankers, and other wealthy business men in that city. Look at the disclosure of corrupt practices in that capital city in the building of the capitol in Harrisburg and the furnishing of the capitol of the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. Look at the disclosures of the bipartisan corruption in Albany, N. Y.

Are we going to have an end to this sort of thing or not?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At this most important——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I object to the Senator from Oklahoma yielding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The Senator from Oklahoma will proceed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not want to take up any time at all, but the Chair will find, and I think——

Mr. KEAN. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana will state his point of order.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does not the rule of the Senate provide that a Senator may be interrupted by his own consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no rule which provides that a Senator can yield the floor to any other Senator in the face of an objection. The Senator from Oklahoma will proceed.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it is for the purpose of having the influence of the Senate of the United States thrown upon the right side of this great contest between the sinister, secret, crafty, most powerful and tremendous commercial interests of the Republic and those demanding integrity of government that I have thought fit to express my views in this case. It is not because I would be willing to wound the feelings of the sitting Member. If he were merely a sinner, so are all men, and so am I, and I would be glad to give him a friendly, brotherly hand. All men make mistakes. I have made many grievous ones, and grievously have I repented them. When men commit wrong, they do it in ignorance of what is best for themselves. No man would willingly do himself a conscious injury. Any man who does wrong does himself a personal injury. This is not a question of personalities. The question is, Shall we by our vote on this case establish a policy of government that will by example and precedent put an end to bribery and corrupt practices or promote it? That is the question, and that is the only question of any great importance in this case. It is true that if the Senate decides erroneously in this matter it will impair its high standing before the people of the United States, and this I should deeply regret, but that is not the most important question.

Mr. President, the committee lays down the doctrine, that if the sitting Member has a majority of the untainted votes he has a title in law which can not be disputed either in law or in morals. I want to examine where that leads. Mr. LORIMER had 108 votes. Seven votes are practically conceded to have been corrupt. That will reduce his number to 101 so-called untainted votes, not enough to elect. It required 102 votes to be a majority of 202, which were present and voting in that legislative assembly. In order to enable a majority to be obtained, therefore, it is necessary to argue that the majority of the untainted votes will suffice; that is, that the 7 bribed votes must not be counted as voting at all. This theory would require 15 tainted votes to have been proven to have been bribed to unseat Mr. LORIMER, and when you prove 15 votes to have been tainted, that argument would admit a larger number to be bribed in order to seat the sitting Member; and when you prove a larger number, that again will permit still more to be tainted, and it would be impossible to unseat any Member on such a basis until you exhausted the quorum.

Let me explain in a moment. Take the case of Mr. Hopkins. He had 70 untainted votes. Suppose some bad friend of Mr. Hopkins—suppose this indeterminate, unknown thing called the Lumber Trust, for example—had been so friendly with Mr. Hopkins and so wanted to seat him that it had gone into the open market and bought 24 votes belonging to Mr. Stringer and had bought 39 votes belonging to Mr. LORIMER, then Mr. LORIMER would have had left only 69 untainted votes, and Mr. Hopkins, with 70 untainted votes, his bad friends having bought in the open market 63 votes, would have a title so pure and so strong under the law that it could not be disputed either in law or in morals.

What kind of doctrine is that? That is the logical consequence of the doctrine of a majority of the untainted votes being sufficient to establish a valid title. Is it good policy? I am sorry that the Senate, at the closing moments of this debate, does itself the honor to absent itself from this Chamber. I wish there could be a photograph of these vacant seats sent out to the American people. I appeal against the proposed judgment of the Senate as prophesied by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who advised the Senate on this floor there were sufficient votes to seat Mr. LORIMER, to the people of the United States. I am not speaking now to the Senate; I am speaking to the masters of the Senate—to the American people.

The election of Senators has been defeated by this body by a few votes. The Members from the Southern States, with the great race question before them, I can sympathize with and I do sympathize with in the fear that moved them; but I have but little sympathy with those of a white constituency who voted against it. I call attention to the fact that the defeat of the joint resolution for the election of Senators by the people was accomplished by the vote of Mr. LORIMER and those other Senators whose seats on this floor are no longer acceptable to the people of their States.

I think the English law is the better law. I think we ought to follow it, because they have found a way to put an end to corrupt practices in that country. It seems to me that whatever the old rule of politics may have been in the past, even those who have played the old pitiful, corrupt game ought to be willing now to let a new rule come in by which our elections shall be clean in this country. The English corrupt-practices act ought to be a matter of easy access to the people, and I should ask that it be made a Senate document, except for the reason that I am quite sure the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] would object.

I call the attention of the country to the remarkable doctrine of the Committee on Privileges and Elections—that a majority of the untainted votes shall suffice. Here is an editorial from the New York Evening Post, from which I read the following:

> If on February 22, when Mr. Sheehan lacked 12 votes of an election in the New York Legislature, his friends had, without his knowledge or consent, bribed 23 of his opponents to vote for him or absent themselves, would the people of New York have regarded this as a valid election in spite of clear proof of the bribery?

Under the rule laid down by the Committee on Privileges and Elections that would have been good law. That title of Mr. Sheehan under such circumstances could not be held invalid either in law or in morals. I will not stultify myself by giving my vote for such a doctrine. It is not only unreasonable; it is not only absurd; it is not only preposterous, but it is immoral, because it promotes immorality, and I will have none of it so far as I am concerned. I propose to stand for what I think is right regardless of whether I meet the approval of the members of the committee or not. They may charge me with a race of diligence in this matter and hold me up to contempt by impugning my motives by suggesting the unworthy purpose of seeking the limelight. So much the worse for those who are pilloried in a vain effort to serve the country. One way to serve bad government is to hold in contempt those who seek good government. But this is not a question of the motives of Senators who may differ with the committee. The advocate of good government now before the Senate knows well enough that he is at present unequal to the task before him. This question is one of great national importance. Its wise determination is of vital consequence. It is the question as to whether the Senate of the United States will throw the weight of its favor and its power on the side of purity of elections or whether it will not, and I leave that question to be determined by the Senators who have absented themselves from this Chamber while the closing argument in this case is being presented and by those Senators who have been already recalled by the American people. These are the Senators who will seat Mr. LORIMER. The decision in this case will have its compensations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have read the report of the committee appointed to investigate the charges against the Senator from Illinois exonerating him of these charges. That report is signed by six of the seven Republicans and four of the five Democrats on this committee. The 10 Senators signing this report are all lawyers; some of them have been judges, trained and educated in weighing and applying testimony, and they are as pure and able men as sit in this body.

I have read practically all the evidence adduced before this committee. I have heard nearly all the speeches that have been delivered on both sides of this controversy. I heard the speech of the junior Senator from Illinois in his own defense—a speech which in logical symmetry and force, in inherent evidences of sincerity and truth, in simple and unconscious pathos will ever live in the memory of all who heard it as one of the most remarkable deliverances ever uttered in this Chamber.

When that speech was concluded my inner consciousness said to me, as many people who heard it have since said to me, if the Senator from Illinois had been guilty he could not have conceived that speech and delivered it as it was delivered by him.

Mr. President, it is said in some sources that the Senator from Illinois is a bad man and unfit for a seat in this body. His speech to which I have just referred answers conclusively the charge of mental fitness for the high office he now fills. That speech shows that intellectually he is the peer of any Senator here. The evidence of the people of his own State and city, who have known him all his life, who have known him in his business, political, and social life, known him in all the walks of life, the evidence of his associates in the House of Representatives, where he served for more than 13 years, all answer the charge that he is a bad man and show that so far from being a bad man in the purity of his life and character he is the peer of any man here.

Giving due weight to the report of the committee, the evidence and the arguments, under my oath I do not feel that the evidence is sufficient to justify me in voting that the Senator is not entitled to the seat in this body to which the certificate of the great State of Illinois, under the common seal of that Commonwealth, declares he is elected.

That various fraudulent schemes to promote and defeat legislation were organized in the Illinois Legislature which elected the Senator, organized when the Senator was at his home sick nigh unto death, organized long before he became a candidate for the Senate and when he was supporting another candidate, I have no doubt; but that the Senator from Illinois bribed anyone to vote for him, or had knowledge of anyone's being bribed to vote for him, I do not believe; and I do not think there are many who do believe it, nor do I believe the evidence satisfactorily proves that anybody was bribed to vote for him.

Mr. President, I can not vote to deprive this man of his property and destroy his character upon the evidence of four men, three of whom were offered immunity from prosecution for high crimes and misdemeanors and who accepted that offer upon condition that they would recant their statement denying that they had been bribed and swear that they had been bribed, and one man who admitted that he sold his story of confession to an inveterate enemy of the Senator for $3,500. I can not accept the testimony of men of this character, especially when the three members of the legislature who they say bribed them have each sworn that there was not a word of truth in their statement and that they have never paid them, or either of them, any money for their votes for the Senator from Illinois. I can not accept as the basis of my vote to destroy the character of a man who has always maintained an irreproachable character evidence of men of the character of these men, especially when the three members of the legislature who, they say, corrupted them, and who under oath flatly contradicted these statements, have been victoriously re-elected to the legislature of Illinois and now hold seats in that honorable body, one of them having been elected speaker of the house of representatives.

Mr. President, we must decide this question on the evidence and the law. Every Senator must apply the evidence for himself. Upon this question we must act as jurors. For myself, I do not question the act of any honorable man who acts upon his oath. With my views of this evidence, if I should yield to the clamor of the newspapers, instigated by the Chicago Tribune, the ancient and relentless enemy of the Senator from Illinois, if I should yield to public clamor aroused and excited by this newspaper agitation based upon articles and editorials written by men, nine-tenths of whom have never read a line of the testimony in this case and know nothing about it except what they have read in other newspapers, I should perjure my conscience and lose my own self-respect.

Mr. President, I was a man zealous of my intellectual integrity and earnestly seeking to preserve the integrity of my conscience as the thing of supremest importance before I was a Senator, and, sir, whatever may happen to me, I shall try to maintain that integrity of thought and conscience to the last.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] read into the RECORD a telegram that he received from the governor of Illinois, endeavoring to refute the statements I made on this floor. An examination of that telegram and the statements that I made will show that to a very great degree the telegram justified the statements, and every statement, that I made with reference to the election of the speaker of the house of the Illinois Legislature. Every statement that I made with reference to the governor's position in the election of United States Senator can be verified by the journal of the joint assembly and the sessions of the two separate bodies.

I made no statement here that can not be verified by an examination of this journal, excepting the statements that I made with reference to the use of patronage in the organization of the house, and those statements have been justified by telegrams from that speaker of the house of representatives, Mr. Shurtleff, Representative Brownback, and Mr. Ford, which I presented to the Senate yesterday.

Much of the telegram submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has no reference at all to any statement that I made upon this floor, but a part of the telegram would indicate that LORIMER and his friends were trying to unseat the governor of the State of Illinois. An investigation of the election was demanded by the Democratic candidate for governor. A resolution was adopted by both branches of the general assembly authorizing such an investigation. Mr. Shurtleff, the speaker of the house, appointed the committee to make the investigation upon the part of the house. He appointed as the chairman Mr. Reynolds, a member of that body and a Republican, Messrs. Maclean, King, Ap Madoc, and Price, five Republicans in all, together with four Democrats. Every solitary one of these Republicans, who constituted the majority of the committee appointed by Mr. Shurtleff, were the close personal friends of Gov. Deneen—men who had followed Gov. Deneen in his contest against Mr. Shurtleff; men who had done what they could, at the dictation of the governor of our State, to defeat Mr. Shurtleff in his candidacy for speaker of the house of representatives of the legislature.

If the appointment of five of the governor's friends, a majority of the committee, is an evidence that Mr. Shurtleff was trying to unseat Gov. Deneen, then it is the sort of evidence, in my opinion, that would convict nobody on any charge in any court anywhere in this country or in any part of the civilized world.

Mr. President, I had not intended to make a further statement, but since I made my statement last Wednesday the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has been zealously trying to test my statements by sending telegrams of inquiry to senators of the Illinois Legislature whose names I mentioned upon this floor, for the purpose of finding out whether or not I told the truth. I listened to most of his remarks here to-day. I was called out for a moment, and it may happen that during that moment he put into the RECORD a telegram to which I am going to refer, but he did not read it while I was present.

State Senator Hearn responded to Senator OWEN'S request for a statement, and in reply sent a telegram to him. I do not know that Senator OWEN ever received the telegram; I do not know whether the telegram was delivered or not, but when Senator Hearn sent his telegram to Washington, he gave a copy of it to the newspaper men, and it was published in the Chicago newspapers—at least one newspaper—for I read it there.

If Senators will remember, I said I had discussed the tariff with Senator Hearn, that he wanted me to vote with the Democrats on that subject, that I told him I was a Republican and had always been a protectionist and that I could not do that. Here is what Senator Hearn telegraphed to the Senator from Oklahoma:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., February 24.

Senator ROBERT L. OWEN,
Washington, D. C.

The interview quoted in Chicago Tribune of this morning regarding conversation I had with Senator LORIMER is substantially correct. He said he was for the income tax and I said that was a Democratic principle which I strongly approved. The only reference to the tariff was as regards to lumber schedule. I asked him if he would be for free lumber. His reply was that he had always been a protectionist and a Republican and would have to remain so. The interview (Tribune) was incorrect in stating that I had been sent for to go to Shurtleff's room. I went of my own accord to see Shurtleff about some bills.

CAMPBELL S. HEARN.

Mr. President, I do not know why that telegram was not read into the RECORD. If we are going to try this case on telegrams, then it does strike me that any Senator who has a degree of fairness about him will publish all the telegrams that he receives when he is trying to get the truth on this question, in order that he who is to be judged may get the benefit of all of the testimony that any Senator may procure in this case.

I take it, Mr. President, that no Senator is searching for that testimony which tends only to convict. I take it that every Senator here, no matter what position he has taken on this question, has been searching for the truth; and the whole truth with reference to this campaign of telegrams should be submitted to this body when they are sent to Senators on their personal inquiry, not only for the satisfaction of the Senator who made the inquiry, but that the Senate may know the whole truth about this matter now under consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am well aware that the time for discussion of this case is past and I can not hope to affect the judgment of Senators, and do not rise for that purpose. I desire to put into the RECORD the reasons for the position which I feel called upon to take in this matter.

I shall say nothing which in any manner could be construed into a doubt as to my belief in the honesty and integrity of the junior Senator from Illinois. I have served with him for 12 years, and never have had occasion to doubt either his capacity or his patriotism. If the speech of the junior Senator from Illinois had been made from his desk on the 6th day of June, when these charges were preferred, I should have accepted his protestations without a moment's hesitation. Indeed, I believe the statement of the Senator from Illinois made in this Chamber a few days ago, detailing the touching and beautiful story of his rise from obscurity to this high position, affected us all; that story is not new to me. It is the story of millions of our countrymen. I am as familiar with the struggles of life as is the junior Senator from Illinois. I honor him for his career and his accomplishments, and we who share the blessing of popular government must never offend against it or bring stain upon our institutions. We have a special duty to our country for the priceless privileges we enjoy. Holding the speech of the Senator from Illinois in one hand and the report of the investigating committee, made by my colleague, in the other, I can not shut my eyes to the overwhelming evidence of debauchery, bribery, and corruption which infested the Legislature of Illinois and left a blazing trail of infamy and dishonor from Springfield to Washington.

The present speaker of the Illinois Assembly said a few days ago that he was not unmindful of the fact that the legislature of that State had lost the confidence of the people of Illinois.

Mr. President, I have not taken part in this debate hitherto because of my respect for my honored colleague, who was the chairman of the committee conducting this investigation. I wish I might be able to reach the same conclusion that he has reached, but I have gone through that record very thoroughly from cover to cover. There is not a line or a syllable in it that I have not read and pondered over. I have gone through the record of the trial of Lee O'Neil Browne before the courts. I have carefully read the charge of the judge in that case.

But, sir, no man can read this testimony without coming to the conclusion that the committee did not go as far as they ought to have gone. They did not summon the witnesses they should have summoned. They have not in the conduct of their investigation met the expectations of the Senate or of the country. More than half the record is encumbered with the controversy of counsel.

From the first day's session until the last counsel for the sitting Member obstructed in every possible way the purpose and the desire of this body to know the truth. For two days Judge Hanecy argued to that committee whether or not they had the power to inquire into the conduct of the joint assembly, the Legislature of Illinois, which had chosen the junior Senator from Illinois, it having adjourned immediately after his election sine die. He seriously consumed the time of the committee over the question of jurisdiction, over the conduct of the members of the Illinois joint assembly, and for two days wrangled with the committee over the admission of testimony plainly relevant on that subject.

From the first page to the last of that written record the counsel of Mr. LORIMER, with a deliberation and a resourcefulness which would have been more creditable to him in a worthier cause, absolutely blocked the purpose of this investigation.

The committee spent little time in Chicago. The witnesses were none of them willing to come. The officers of the committee spent days looking for these witnesses, and finally when they submitted themselves to examination and were asked pointed questions bearing upon the truthfulness of these charges, dissembled and hesitated and some shielded themselves behind their constitutional right and refused to testify.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. If it interrupts the Senator, I have no desire to proceed; but I am so sure he does not want to put anything in the RECORD which is not fair and just that I should like to have the privilege of calling his attention to one matter with respect to a circumstance on which he has just been commenting.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. While it is true that the witness Broderick claimed his exemption, he did it under a constitutional provision in Illinois—somewhat different from that which exists in most States—which privileges a man against furnishing evidence or testimony against himself.

The Senator from Michigan, of course, knows that Broderick was at that time under indictment in Sangamon County on the charge of having bribed Holstlaw. The county attorney, or State's attorney, whatever his legal designation is, of that county sat in the room of this committee. That the Senator from Michigan may know exactly what Broderick meant, one of the questions which he refused to answer was as to the people who were in his barroom at the time Holstlaw was in there.

Of course, the Senator from Michigan perfectly understands that such a question had no relation to whether or not he had paid to this man Holstlaw any money; but the purpose was to get from Broderick a list of his witnesses by whom he intended to prove that he did not take Holstlaw into the side room where this money was said to have been paid.

Broderick answered all of the questions as to the distinct and separate charge of bribery, but he declined simply to unfold his defense before the committee; and I hardly think the Senator from Michigan, upon a reexamination of the record, would be willing to have it stand as his judgment that Broderick did not have a right to do that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President; the Senator from Texas misunderstands me. When Broderick took the stand his counsel tried to get an agreement with the Senate committee as to the extent of their inquiry and the rule as to his privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Michigan yield? The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 32010) to create a tariff board.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the vote has been taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want the Senator from Texas, whose judgment I always respect, to understand the point I have made, that the counsel for Mr. LORIMER and the counsel for Mr. Broderick undertook to thwart the purposes of this investigation at every point.

Mr. BAILEY. No; the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. One moment. Let me finish that.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As an illustration: When Broderick took the stand, his counsel, Mr. Dawson, undertook to get an agreement from the committee that they would not ask him certain questions. The Senator from Texas remembers that.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Texas also remembers that when the committee did ask certain questions of Mr. Broderick it was not Mr. Broderick who first availed himself of his constitutional privilege, but it was Mr. Dawson, his counsel, who indignantly said that he must not answer because it would incriminate him.

Mr. BAILEY. No; he did not use the word "incriminate," as I recall it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What did he say?

Mr. BAILEY. He simply invoked the constitution of Illinois. However, that is not material. I will not even say that I am correct in saying that he did not use that particular word; but what I wanted the Senator to understand and what I wanted the Senate to understand was that Broderick's exemption was claimed under a statute of Illinois, and that exemption was not that this testimony would incriminate him, but that he was not compelled to furnish evidence. For instance, my recollection is that they once asked him if he wrote a letter to Holstlaw, and he declined to answer that. My recollection is that he afterwards did answer it; but when they asked him who was in the barroom, that could plainly have no bearing on this case. Its only purpose was to compel Broderick to furnish the State attorney with the names of the witnesses by whom he intended upon the trial to contradict the testimony of Holstlaw. Broderick did testify pointedly and distinctly on the main point involved here, and that is that he made no contract with Holstlaw to pay him money, and that he did not pay any money to Holstlaw. He did not refuse to testify on those points.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Did he not refuse to answer whether he had written to Holstlaw to come to Chicago and get that money?

Mr. BAILEY. No; that was not the question. The question was whether he had written a letter asking Holstlaw to come to Chicago.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In answer to that question he said——

Mr. BAILEY. He refused to answer.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He said, "I refuse to answer."

Mr. BAILEY. I have just stated that; but I am under the impression that at a different time in the investigation he did answer that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think not.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am quite familiar with the record.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], who sits here, and who was a member of the subcommittee, advises me that I am right about that. But whether he did or not, the Senator just makes it evident that he is not as unbiased in this matter as he usually is about all matters, because he states that Broderick was asked if he did not write a letter to Holstlaw to come to Chicago and get that money. That question was not asked him. The question asked him was whether he had written Holstlaw a letter to come to Chicago. He might have written a letter to a man asking him to come from some other place for some other purpose, and that is a different question from the one the Senator has just stated.

But, Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon, and I would not have ventured to interrupt him to put this in the RECORD except that I know he wants to be just and fair, and I pay him the compliment to take his time in order to help him to be so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thank the Senator from Texas. I do want to be just and fair, and I do know the record. I have studied the case with great care, and I repeat what I said in the first place, that the most studied attempt from the beginning of this investigation until its close was made by the counsel of Mr. LORIMER and the counsel of Mr. Broderick and others who appeared there to thwart the purpose of this investigation. I know that I am right about it.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me? Of course, I have nothing to say about the counsel of Mr. Broderick. I am not sure that I remember the name, though I think the Senator has called it correctly when he named him Dawson.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. His name was Dawson.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator is a lawyer, and if he were employed to defend a man against any charge and that man were to be called before a committee or a tribunal of any kind to testify with respect to a transaction for which he had been indicted, would not the Senator feel bound by his duty to his client to protect him against being compelled to unfold his case? The more innocent I felt that my client was, the more I would feel compelled to protect him under such a condition.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Texas knows that every accused person is entitled to trial and that every accused person is entitled to counsel.

Mr. BAILEY. And to a fair trial.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To a fair trial and to counsel. But the point I am making is that this is not a forum where the rules of evidence are hard and fast. This was not such a tribunal as gave to the counsel for any of these parties a right to be heard. They were there by the courtesy of this committee, and I say that their course should have been to have assisted the committee in getting at the actual facts under investigation.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator and I agree about that. I think the committee very properly refused to make any agreement as to the extent of its examination of Broderick. I am sure they were wise in that and well within the rules. The only suggestion I was making here was that it is fair to say that because the counsel had interposed to protect his client, not against answering questions which were under investigation, but against being compelled to file, as it were, a list of his witnesses in that proceeding, he was trying to thwart the object of the investigation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, this book is simply filled with attempts upon the part of Judge Haney and Mr. Dawson and the other lawyers and advisers in this proceeding to thwart the purpose of the Senate, which was to get at the facts. I marvel at the patience of the committee and I am surprised that they should have denied themselves the latitude conferred by the Senate resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me just this one suggestion further?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the Senate committee acted properly in refusing to permit any testimony to come before it except what related to the election of a Senator. I would resist to the utmost of my power any effort of the Senate of the United States to investigate the proceedings of the Texas Legislature, except so far as it touched the election of a Senator here, and that is all that this committee did.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Texas and myself differ very widely on that question.

Mr. President, I can not be interrupted again; others desire to speak, and the time for a vote is at hand. I wish I had time to discuss the treatment of witnesses, but I can not do so.

White has been discredited by everyone. He has been absolutely repudiated. Yet on the day this money was given to him by Mr. Browne at St. Louis poor White went into a department store, the largest in East St. Louis, and asked for the manager and handed him the money and left it with him over night and got it next day; is there any doubt about that? It has gone unchallenged and must be accepted as true. From what source did he get this money? Everybody knows that it harmonizes with the other circumstances surrounding the case.

But, Mr. President, I shall not even mention the name of another witness. We are weary of their misdoings. I am fully convinced that this record as we have it before us discloses the most brazen bravado, bribery, and corruption in the election of the Senator from Illinois, and I can not close my eyes to the record now a part of the official proceedings of this body.

Mr. President, I reach that conclusion very reluctantly. I am sorry I can not agree with my venerable colleague, but I am out of accord with his conclusions at every point on this question. I will not stultify myself or misrepresent the law-abiding people of my State in such a crisis as now confronts us. This record is reeking with perjury and corruption, and I can not by my vote approve the character and integrity of the Legislature of Illinois in this proceeding.

Mr. President, we must soon vote. I have sought only to be fair and just in my judgment on this case. I have given my opinion without prejudice, with the kindliest spirit, regretting the unfortunate circumstance which forced this issue upon us and brought this scandal upon the country. The conduct of certain members of the Legislature of Illinois was most reprehensible. It is not creditable to the people of that State, and I believe will be repudiated by them when opportunity offers; and if approved by the Senate its historic traditions will mean less to the youth of our land than ever before; for us to condone this crime against our institutions is for us to trifle with our sacred responsibility to the people and voluntarily fix a new standard of political excellence unworthy our example in this exalted station.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in the few moments remaining before the discussion is closed I can only leave a word upon this record.

Those of us upon whom rests the responsibility for the rule which the Senate of the United States is to adopt are here but for a brief time at best. The record which we are to make is enduring.

Forces as irresistible as the tides are at work and moving throughout the land toward a complete restoration of self-government. This is manifest in the record made yesterday for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people after every effort to secure consideration has been baffled for more than half a century. It will confront the Senate again at the next session. It will not be denied. The people are aroused. They well understand that representative government fails at the point where they transfer their authority to the representative. The purchase of United States Senatorships, the bribing of State legislatures, has occurred too often in recent years. Corrupt the election of the representative and the whole system goes down.

In the case which we have under discussion, these are the facts that will hereafter be accepted and established as a precedent for all time to come: That money was paid to members of the legislature, Democratic members, who voted to elect a Republican United States Senator; that four Democratic members confessed to receiving such money, under circumstances that can leave no doubt that they were bribed; that one Democratic member, deceased, was proven to have been present when the money was distributed, and proven afterwards to have had money in substantially the same-sized bills, and the same amount, as that corruptly paid to others; that strong circumstantial evidence points to the payment of money to still other members who were closely associated with those proven to have received it; that at least one member of the legislature was bribed to vote for the sitting Member by the promise that he, the legislator, should exercise a certain control regarding a post-office appointment at Jerseyville, Ill., and that this was on the promise of the sitting Member, and was the consideration and the only consideration for said legislator's vote for WILLIAM LORIMER; that at least one other member of the legislature was offered money to vote for the sitting Member and that others were approached and sounded on the subject; that three other members of the legislature—one of them the leader, the organizer—swore that he did not know the sitting Member "except to see him," a "mere passing acquaintance," "hardly a speaking acquaintance," and that LORIMER contradicted him and said that he "became very intimate with him years ago;" that one other member of the legislature, as soon as an investigation was ordered, ran to cover, and remained beyond the reach of a subpœna for weeks; that still another, who refused to answer because if he answered and told the truth it would incriminate him, claimed his privilege before the Senate committee.

Mr. President, you may go down the records of the Senate of the United States and you can find no other case like this one.

The precedent to be established will not only react on the future of the Senate, it will stand as a fearful example to our State legislatures. Every citizen knows that the Senate is the judge—the absolute judge—of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members. And the American people are waiting with even tenser feeling than this audience the result of the roll call upon this question. The principal facts are as clear in the public mind as they are clear in the minds of Senators here, and no discussion of technicalities as to how many tainted votes are needful to corrupt an election will affect their judgment. The decision about to be recorded will destroy public confidence and create a revulsion of feeling beyond our comprehension.

For two months and one day this case was dragged along here, a vote upon it resisted by the Senators who are defending the title to this seat. When finally a sort of understanding appeared to be reached, and the word was passed along the line that there were enough votes, then those who had been resisting a vote upon the question became eager to put it through.

Now, Mr. President, taken altogether, the testimony in this case convinces me that the sitting Member had personal knowledge of the bribery which was committed to secure his seat. The testimony shows that he occupied a room with the speaker of the house of representatives, who was in constant communication with Lee O'Neil Browne, through whose hands thousands of dollars of the bribe money passed. The testimony shows that Browne occupied a room either connected with or near to the speaker's room. They are proven to have been in conference day and night. It is impossible, Senators, that the sitting Member should not have known what was going on. If you believe that there is bribery in this case, you must, it seems to me, believe that he knew it.

Why did he not go as a witness before the investigating committee? Would not any other Senator on this floor have demanded to be heard by that committee?

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In——

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to put in just a word at this point, where the statement is made that the Senator from Illinois knew about this. One of the members of the subcommittee, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER], in his minority views, says:

> While there are some facts and circumstances in this case tending to show that Senator LORIMER may have heard of or known that corrupt practices were being resorted to, and while Senator LORIMER failed to avail himself of the opportunity of going on the stand as a witness and denying any such knowledge or sanction of corrupt practices, if any such were being practiced, still I am of the opinion that the testimony fails to establish the fact that Senator LORIMER was himself guilty of bribery or other corrupt practices——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not yield further. My time expires in a moment.

Mr. BURROWS (reading):

or that he sanctioned or was cognizant of the fact that bribery or other corrupt practices were being used by others to influence votes for him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will reply to what the Senator is seeking to put into the record.

Mr. BURROWS. Just one sentence.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. One moment. It can not be claimed, and I am not claiming, that there is direct and positive evidence to prove personal knowledge. If there were it would end this contest and vacate this seat. But I say, when you take this whole case, take the atmosphere that surrounded the entire situation there—this man on the ground for months, a shrewd, trained political manager, blocking the election of any avowed candidate, while men were being sounded out, terms agreed upon, patronage promised, and prices fixed, the votes delivered, for which the money was subsequently paid—I say, it is unbelievable that he, in whose interest it was all worked out, was ignorant of what was in every mind and whispered in nearly every ear. It is impossible that he should have been in daily contact with the men who were bribed and the men who bribed them and fail to know just what was afoot.

The conviction that he had guilty knowledge is strenghthened and confirmed by the fact that he did not offer himself as a witness and demand that his testimony be taken and that he be subject to the most searching cross-examination. Instead he is silent. He does not even make a statement on the floor in this debate until he was led to believe that he would have the last word. It all goes to show that this seat was secured by bribery and with the knowledge of the man who claims it.

Mr. BURROWS. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator allow me just a word more?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a word.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We do not know, we are not able to say just where the money came from. I concede that. That is often so; that must be so; but a large amount of money is shown to have been used in this case.

I am not able to say where the $114,000, which was acknowledged to have been used in Wisconsin to defeat my election, came from further than to be able to say that I can prove that part of it came from Wall Street and——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of half past 1 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let the resolution on which we are to vote be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 315, submitted by Mr. BEVERIDGE on January 9, 1911, as follows:

Resolved, That WILLIAM LORIMER was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Illinois.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when Mr. FRAZIER's name was called). The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER] is absent at his home on account of the death of his mother. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BACON (when Mr. TERRELL's name was called). My colleague [Mr. TERRELL] is necessarily detained from the Chamber by personal illness. I desire to state for him and upon his authority that, while he has been detained from the Chamber, he has examined the record in the case and has made up his judgment, and that if he were present he would vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 40, nays 46, as follows:

REVISION OF LAWS—JUDICIARY TITLE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, before the unfinished business is stated I desire to make a conference report, for which I ask present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho presents a conference report, and asks for its present consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE and Mr. SMOOT. Let the report be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

Mr. ROOT. Before the question of whether there is objection to the consideration of the conference report, I beg to inquire what is its nature?

Mr. KEAN. Let us have order.

Mr. SCOTT. We can not hear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As soon as order is restored the Secretary will read the conference report, which will disclose what it is.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Until the Senate is in order nothing will be done.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is the conference report, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read as soon as order is restored.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I will yield, although this is a privileged report, to which there can be no objection.

Mr. ROOT. I purpose to speak in my own right, Mr. President, on——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York has not yet obtained the floor.

Mr. ROOT (continuing). The question of whether there was objection to the present consideration of the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A request has been made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the report be read before the request for its consideration be put. The Chair has said that the report is about to be read, and then the Chair will state the request.

Mr. ROOT. The only purpose I had in rising was to secure the reading of the report before the question was foreclosed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It certainly will be read before there is any foreclosure or any other proceeding.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator presenting this conference report to state its nature, because, if it is a long report——

Mr. HEYBURN. Regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the reading of the report.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. By what right?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A conference report can be presented at any time, but it can not be acted upon without a vote of the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Idaho——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order has been demanded, which is the reading of the conference report. The Secretary will read the report (S. Doc. No. 848).

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill S. 7031, being a bill to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

Writs of error and appeals shall be taken within the same time, in the same manner, and under the same regulations as writs of error and appeals are taken from the circuit courts of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Section 251: This section is intended to take the place of section 238 of the House amendment.

Section 251: Strike out the section and substitute the following: "In any case in which the judgment or decree of said court of appeals is made final by the section last preceding, it shall be competent for the Supreme Court of the United States to require, by certiorari or otherwise, any such cause to be certified to it for its review and determination, with the same power and authority in the case as if it had been carried by writ of error or appeal to said Supreme Court. It shall also be competent for said court of appeals, in any case in which its judgment or decree is made final under the section last preceding, at any time to certify to the Supreme Court of the United States any questions or propositions of law concerning which it desires the instruction of that court for their proper decision; and thereupon the Supreme Court may either give its instructions on the questions and propositions certified to it, which shall be binding upon said court of appeals in such case, or it may require that the whole record and cause be sent up to it for its consideration, and thereupon shall decide the whole matter in controversy in the same manner as if it had been brought there for review by writ of error or appeal."

Section 259: This section is intended to take the place of a part of section 2, all of section 126, and of 202*bb*, in the bill as it passed the House.

"SEC. 259. The circuit justices, the circuit and district judges of the United States, and the judges of the district courts of the United States in Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, shall each be allowed and paid his necessary expenses of travel, and his reasonable expenses (not to exceed $10 per day) actually incurred for maintenance, consequent upon his attending court or transacting other official business in pursuance of law at any place other than his official place of residence, said expenses to be paid by the marshal of the district in which such court is held or official business transacted, upon the written certificate of the justice or judge. The official place of residence of each justice and of each circuit judge while assigned to the Commerce Court shall be at Washington; and the official place of residence of each circuit and district judge, and of each judge of the district courts of the United States in Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, shall be at that place nearest his actual residence at which either a circuit court of appeals or a district court is regularly held. Every such judge shall, upon his appointment, and from time to time thereafter whenever he may change his official residence, in writing notify the Department of Justice of his official place of residence."

Section 260: On page 202, in line 10, strike out the words "a time 10 years before" and insert "at the time of."

Section 284: On page 211, in line 20, after the word "therefor," insert the following:

"If the United States attorney for any district which has a city or borough containing at least 300,000 inhabitants shall certify in writing to the district judge, or the senior district judge of the district, that the exigencies of the public service require it, the judge may, in his discretion, also order a venire to issue for a second grand jury."

Section 289: On page 216, in line 3, before the word "authority," insert the word "same."

Section 297: On page 218, in line 13, strike out "twenty" and insert "fourteen"; in line 14, after the word "inclusive," insert the following: "Sections 716 to 720, both inclusive."

On page 220, in line 3, after the word "eighty-seven," insert "except sections 4, 5, 6, 7, and 10 thereof." Beginning in line 13 strike out the following: "An act to establish circuit court of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1891." On page 221, in line 13, after the word "eleven," insert the following: "Sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, the first paragraph of section 6, and section 17 of an act entitled 'An act to create a Commerce Court, and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes,' approved June 18, 1910."

Section 298: On page 221, in line 21, after the word "act," insert the words "or affecting the organization of the courts."

Section 299: On page 222, in line 6, after the word "proceeding," insert the following: "including those pending on writ of error, appeal, certificate, or writ of certiorari, in any appellate court referred to or included within the provisions of this act."

Section 301: On page 222, in line 19, strike out the word "July" and insert "January"; and strike out the word "eleven" and insert the word "twelve."

Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If it is a question merely of agreeing to the report without proceeding to its consideration and discussion, that might be done; but, if agreeing to the report——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The only motion before the Senate is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand that; but I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would be very glad, indeed, to have the report agreed to, with such exceptions as Senators may desire to designate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That can not be done.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think, Mr. President, that is done every day in the case of conference reports——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let the report go over for a day.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to finish the sentence that I am uttering.

Mr. President, what I desire to have is that the uncontroverted portion of the report may be acted upon as we do every day and then ask for a further conference upon the contested points.

Mr. LODGE. Is it a complete agreement?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Then it can only be acted upon as a whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands. The Senator from Idaho presented a conference report which is a complete agreement.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that. If we act upon it as a whole, I understand we can not amend it, but we can reserve for further conference——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can withdraw his report and make a partial report and ask for a further conference.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is the only way.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will proceed along those lines and will make a partial report. Let me have the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator withdraws the report.

SEVERAL SENATORS. The regular order!

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to retain the floor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. You can not withdraw the report and retain the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. HEYBURN. I had the floor for the purpose of making this report, and I have not yielded.

SEVERAL SENATORS. The regular order!

Mr. WARREN. I do not see any necessity for this commotion about the regular order, and so forth. Of course, a conference report is entitled to be presented, and if its consideration is denied, it goes over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to present a partial report.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. A partial report has the same privilege as a complete report.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator can not——

Mr. WARREN. As far as a conference report is concerned, it has the right of way——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. One moment, if you please; I have the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has the floor.

Mr. WARREN. After sitting here some 10 days with an appropriation bill half finished, I shall very soon raise the question of consideration upon any other business.

As to the matter of conference reports, it is well established that a report can be presented. It is well established that when presented, if objected to it must go over.

Mr. LODGE. The privilege is to make the report.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. That privilege is now exhausted, and I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate consider the conference report?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not asking that. I have withdrawn that, or, rather, it was only an alternative suggestion. But I now ask to present a partial report from the conference committee on this bill and ask for the adoption of the partial report, which does not include the provision with regard to the removal of causes to United States courts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho presents the following conference report.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. PENROSE. But the conferees have not signed any partial report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no notice of a partial report until it is presented.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no record of that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine was recognized, and not the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HALE. What I desire is to call the attention of the Senate to the parliamentary course upon conference reports. They are always privileged. They are not subject to a single objection, which carries them over.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. But the moment a conference report is presented the question of consideration can be raised by any Senator.

Mr. LODGE. And that is what I did.

Mr. HALE. It is not a personal matter. It is not a desire to take the Senator from Idaho from the floor. It is simply what we have got to do at this stage in order to give the Senate the opportunity of considering or not. That is not debatable. It is a question for the Senate at once to decide.

Nobody is seeking to drive the Senator from Idaho from the floor. All of us have had experience with the Senator, so that we are not inclined to enter into that contest. But I gave notice yesterday—and that does not settle anything—that after the vote was taken on the Lorimer case I should ask the Senate to proceed with the appropriation bills. I also gave notice, and the foundation of that was my somewhat long experience in the way to manage evening sessions, that instead of undertaking a protracted session, which never ends in business, I should ask the Senate at half past 5—that is what we have done heretofore—to take a recess until 8 o'clock. That gives the Senators who have been here, as some of us have been, ever since 9 o'clock, if we choose, to go home to dinner or to go to our committee rooms for luncheon or dinner and come back at 8 o'clock.

All of my experience is that in three hours, after that respite between half past 5 and 8 o'clock, the Senate is ready and desirous of doing business. I would give more for those three hours between 8 and 11 to do business, pass bills, and make progress, which is essential, than I would for all of the time on a protracted session. We tried it the other night and made no progress in anything, and I shall move at half past 5 that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock.

But I am entirely in the hands of the Senate. If the Senate does not want to give the evening to appropriation bills and wants to give the evening to something else, I am powerless. But so far as I am concerned, with these days disappearing, and it being a question not of days, but of hours, the Senate may just as well be confronted with the fact that half a dozen of the appropriation bills will go over. I am going to submit to the action of the Senate.

I should hope, the question of consideration having been raised, that the Senator from Wyoming, who has charge of the agricultural appropriation bill, will go on with it unless—and when I say that I know what the habit and courtesy of the Senate are—some Senator desires to take the floor. If so, the Senate loses nothing by allowing that Senator to take the floor, because if you get up the appropriation bill under our rules the Senator may talk upon the bill and spend all the time that is necessary.

I do not know about it, but I should like to have the Senate put itself on record whether it wants to go on now with the appropriation bills.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask to make a privileged report.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has been recognized to make a report.

Mr. HALE. What has become of the other report of the Senator from Idaho?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has withdrawn it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have a privileged report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from California to make a report.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. PERKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 32212) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 1265) thereon.

Mr. HALE. The Senator undoubtedly has the right to submit his report.

REVISION OF LAWS—JUDICIARY TITLE.

Mr. HEYBURN. I make the following privileged report.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If the Senator has in any way modified the report as signed by the conferees, his action, of course, is not——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not in any wise modified or disturbed it. It is the report made by the conferees.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I would like to say a word about that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not asked for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts raises the question of the consideration of the report, and that has to be put to the Senate without debate. The question is, Will the Senate consider the report?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Idaho says he does not ask for present consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

Mr. LODGE. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the report be printed and go over.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. JONES. Will the Secretary read the report, so that we may know what it is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill involved in the report will be stated.

Mr. JONES. I object to the waiving of the reading of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the report, the Chair will state to the Senator from Washington, is a part of the consideration of the report.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The report has been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report has been read.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; the report has not been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report goes over.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator returned the same report—the report which has been read. There is no mistake about that. The Clerk read the report.

Mr. LODGE. The whole thing has gone over.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I understand that. I want it to go over to a time when it——

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senate will not take it up now unless it votes affirmatively on the point of consideration now.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, under what order are we now doing business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to give notice now that, unless there shall be some motion to lay aside the unfinished business, I shall, at 3 o'clock, move to take up the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask that when 3 o'clock arrives the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside so that the agricultural appropriation bill may be proceeded with.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say in this connection, so that those who have an interest in that bill may be here, it is my purpose to move at 3 o'clock to take up the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Out of order I wish to introduce a bill.

SEVERAL SENATORS. The regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 32010) to create a tariff board.

TARIFF BOARD.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. STONE. What is the question now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing——

Mr. LODGE. The bill has been read and all the committee amendments agreed to except the last. The question is upon the last amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. There are two or three Senators talking at the same time. I would like to know what is the question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. On page 5——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to section 7. The Secretary will state it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Read it.

Mr. NELSON. What bill is this?

Mr. LODGE. The tariff commission bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is the Tariff Board bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to ask the Senator——

Mr. NELSON. What bill is this?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will kindly take their seats. Senators will come to order. The Chair will recognize a Senator when there is order. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

Mr. HALE. There was an understanding, I supposed, that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] desired to address the Senate upon this bill, and the Senator from Wyoming, in charge of the next appropriation bill, had yielded for that purpose, and he agreed that he would wait and would not call up the appropriation bill until after 3 o'clock.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know how the Senator from Maine received that impression. I said to certain Senators that I thought the unfinished business ought to be proceeded with for an hour, at least, this afternoon, but I did not suggest to anybody that I had any desire to make a speech upon it. I want to vote upon it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Iowa can not have a vote upon it while appropriation bills are pending.

Mr. PENROSE. Let us have the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I give notice that when 3 o'clock arrives I will ask that the unfinished business——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana is out of order, and he will take his seat.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And I will say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine has been recognized and not the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HALE. If any Senator desires to go on and debate this question or any other question——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not informed as to that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was just rising to ask the Senator from Iowa if the proposition is to take this vote without discussion.

Mr. LODGE. Of course it is not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Any Senator who desires to discuss this bill or any amendment to it can do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. We ought to have a quorum here. I suggest the want of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Caroline suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Crane	Heyburn	Richardson
Bankhead	Culberson	Johnston	Root
Beveridge	Cullom	Jones	Scott
Borah	Cummins	Kean	Shively
Bourne	Curtis	Lodge	Smith, Mich
Bradley	Depew	Lorimer	Smoot
Brandegee	Dick	Martin	Stone
Briggs	Dixon	Money	Sutherland
Brown	Fletcher	Nelson	Swanson
Bulkeley	Flint	Newlands	Taliaferro
Burkett	Foster	Overman	Taylor
Burnham	Gallinger	Page	Warner
Burrows	Gamble	Penrose	Warren
Burton	Gore	Percy	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Gronna	Perkins	Young
Clapp	Guggenheim	Piles
Clarke, Ark.	Hale	Rayner

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, section 7, in line 17, after the word "with," insert "as hereinbefore provided, including all testimony."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I regret very much that this measure should be taken under consideration when the time for consideration is so brief as it necessarily will be, inasmuch as the agricultural appropriation bill is to be taken up in about 40 minutes.

Mr. President, I am not at all in sympathy with this measure. I am not in sympathy with it as a political principle. I do not approve it because of its language or the purpose for which the language is used. It seems to be going along in rather a merry mood, as though it could do no harm. There is not a measure before Congress that may do more harm than this.

I will desist for a moment. I am not accustomed to participating in duets or trios.

Mr. DEPEW. Order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is impossible for the Senator from Idaho to proceed until there is order. The Senate will be in order, and Senators will kindly take their seats.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if the Senate is going to insist on the consideration of this bill, the Senate had better devote its attention to the consideration of it.

I am not surprised that there has been an inquiry as to what bill it is. It is a bill which proposes to transfer the duties which are vested in Congress by the Constitution to an irresponsible board, in order, I suppose, that the people's rights may flow from a different source, because in the judgment of those who drew or conceived the idea of this bill Congress was a very incompetent medium through which the people should obtain their legal rights.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I think from the Senator's remarks that I now recognize the bill to which he refers.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am pleased to have so accurately described it; and I assume that the Senator from Maine has some sympathy with the description which I have given of it that may go to the merits of it.

When this question was before the Senate some time ago I expressed myself briefly upon the general principle. But this being made the unfinished business, if we are going to be compelled to stand between the people of this country and a proposed infringement of their rights, I shall have to hold myself ready to speak upon this bill at any time; and I think I am prepared to do it.

It is true for the moment only that the amendment, which is expressed in the words "as hereinbefore provided, including all testimony," attached to one of the paragraphs or sections of this bill, is of the utmost importance.

This section reads, with the proposed amendment, section 7:

That said board shall submit the results of its investigations, as hereinbefore provided, including all testimony, together with any explanatory report of the facts so ascertained, to the President or to either House of Congress, from time to time, when called upon by the President or either House of Congress.

This is rather an expensive board, and if the President should overlook them, which I suppose he would for intervals, say, of a year or two and Congress should forget their existence for another year or two, they would have nothing to do but draw their salaries.

But the "hereinbefore provided" part of the amendment under consideration invites us to look back at the other sections of the bill to see what is hereinbefore provided. Every section preceding section 7 is made a part of section 7 by those words. I repeat that. Those two words, innocent appearing, become a part of every preceding section, and require every section preceding section 7 to be interpreted in connection with that provision before you can know what the law is. That is part of the amendment directly under consideration.

Section 6 contains a part of the "hereinbefore provided." In section 6 it is provided that any investigation authorized by the proposed act the board may obtain such evidence or information as it may deem advisable.

Now, Mr. President, that leaves the board the sole judge as to what information Congress needs or the President needs in determining the basis upon which revenue laws shall be made.

We are not to have any other information except such as this board may deem advisable. The words "for its confidential use, and in case the evidence or information is so obtained" were crossed out. It was intended originally that they should not disclose to Congress or the President the information upon which they were going to act, but they repented of that evil and sought to make the evil less.

But said board shall not be required to divulge the names of persons.

There is no exception or limitation to that. We are going to create a few favored men who go and pry into the private business of the people in this and other countries and keep it to themselves, confidential information. They may give us the results of it and some general expression of their wisdom.

Mr. HALE. Or may not.

Mr. HEYBURN. Or may not.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I notice that we appropriate about $400,000 in the sundry civil appropriation bill for a tariff board to be continued for two, three, or four years, and now this is another commission. Do I understand it is the policy to continue paying to that board $400,000 and to appropriate money for this board, too?

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not answer all of that, because I can not anticipate what the policy is. Policies are as indefinite as floating clouds. If it pleases the person who is desirous of adopting it, it is all right, and if it does not, it is all wrong.

Now, just a moment about that—

But said board shall not be required to divulge the names of persons furnishing such evidence or information.

I am not a prophet of evil, but I can see a certain class of men on a board of that kind possessed, at the expense of the Government, of a vast amount of private information, who might be blessed with a few relatives who could put them in the way of doing rather a nice stroke of business, having private knowledge as to the private affairs of people in other countries and in this country, because this board is also, in another section, authorized to investigate these same questions in the United States and to have information about the business of business men of the United States that no one else would have.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. Does it not strike the Senator from Idaho that it would be of great value to Congress to get the names of the parties giving this testimony? Would not that enable Congress to determine whether the testimony is of any value? Ought we not to have the sources from which that testimony comes?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly. The statement itself that some person had testified so and so would be of no value whatever.

Mr. NELSON. It strikes me that that is a great mistake. We ought to have the names of all the witnesses published.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Minnesota in that regard, and I will doubtless reach the discussion of that question under the conditions.

Mr. NELSON. I will be glad to have the Senator discuss it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I shall doubtless reach it.

Mr. President, what are the members of this board to do? We will look at that. Here in section 5 there is a provision that has no equal or counterpart in the history of legislation:

SEC. 5. That for the purposes of this act said board shall have power to subpœna witnesses, to take testimony, administer oaths, and to require any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association engaged in the production, importation, or distribution of any article under investigation to produce books and papers relating to any matter pertaining to such investigation. In case of failure to comply with the requirements of this section, the board may report to Congress such failure, specifying the names of such persons, the individual names of such firm or copartnership, and the names of the officers and directors of each such corporation or association so failing, which report shall also specify the article or articles produced, imported, or distributed by such person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association, and the tariff schedule which applies to such article.

That is a part of the hereinbefore provided amendment.

Then section 4 gives or purports to give the purpose of this act:

SEC. 4. That to enable the President to secure information as to the effect of tariff rates, restrictions, exactions, or any regulations imposed at any time by any foreign country upon the importation into or sale in any such foreign country of any products of the United States, and as to any export bounty paid or export duty imposed or prohibition made by any country upon the exportation of any article to the United States which discriminates against the United States or the products thereof, and to assist the President in the application of the maximum and minimum tariffs and other administrative provisions of the customs laws, the board shall, from time to time, make report, as the President shall direct.

Where is Congress? Has Congress adjourned?

They shall make that class of reports as the President may direct, and they are paid to obtain information through secret means and retain the information to themselves. We are to pay for it. For what purpose? I suppose wrapped up in that language is the purpose to determine just exactly the relative cost of certain articles in foreign countries and at home. But while that is always a proper inquiry in considering tariff rates, it is not a proper consideration of the basis upon which tariff rates are to be fixed. They are authorized to inquire, for instance, in Germany as to the cost of hardware or any other article. They go there to the German shops of the higher order. The exports from the country are principally from the larger manufacturing establishments or exporting houses. The product of the small shop generally supplies the local market. Then they report that the cost of a certain line of hardware or cutlery, which are important items of importation from Germany, is a certain figure. They report that to the President. They do not tell him how they obtained the information or from whom they obtained it, because they are forbidden to report names.

Now, Mr. President, the object of that report may be a basis for comparison of the cost of production between that country and ours. Doubtless those countries would aid the representatives if they knew they were making the inquiry to ascertain the facts, but it seems to be contemplated that they shall obtain these facts surreptitiously from the manufacturers of those countries or the producers of the product.

Now, then, the next step on the part of this board is to come home to this country with this information that they have gathered for the purpose of ascertaining the cost of producing a like product here. We will say that they go to a large establishment, equipped in the most complete manner, where the article can be produced for the least possible price, and they take that as a basis of the cost of American production. They will not go to the little mill or factory up the valley to find out what it costs them, with machinery not so modern, with equipment and conditions not so favorable. They will not go there for information. They will take as the basis of the cost of American production the cost in this finished, improved, and least expensively operated mill, and they will compare that with the cost abroad.

Then what? What is the object? If it is to be used as a basis of tariff making, we are required, according to the doctrine of this bill, to find what would be a reasonable profit. This commission is to investigate that question. What would be the result? First, what would they take as a basis for a reasonable profit? Would it be a reasonable profit with a large and expensively equipped and cheaply operated mill, with a large investment of capital, or would it be a reasonable profit to the owner of the little mill up the canyon or down on the river bank who operated it with his own hands, with the assistance perhaps of his own family? Which are you going to take? If you base the tariff upon the difference of cost between the finished, high-class mill abroad and a mill of the same class on this side, then 5 or 6 per cent difference or 7 or 8 per cent, as they might conclude, would be considered a reasonable profit. But that difference would not only not afford a reasonable profit to the mill that was not equipped so well, but which if they operated at all they operated at a loss.

That applies to every foundry and factory, to mechanical processes of any kind that produce articles entering into the American market. Who is going to say what profit shall be guaranteed, so far as tariff legislation is concerned, to the mill that is equipped in the old fashion and that is operated by the owner? Who is going to say what a fair profit shall be to that man? If his profit is to be fixed upon the basis of the investigation of this commission, then that would afford a very generous profit to the better-equipped manufacturer.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would not all those matters be taken into consideration by this commission, and could we not trust the Senate and the House to give us a perfected bill that would practically guard all our industries, even though some should make a little more profit than we would think they needed?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I sincerely trust we can. The endeavor of those who really understand and represent the protective tariff policy has been in the past and doubtless will be in the future to make a tariff wall high enough to insure protection to all of them. I presume the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] is answering the question asked by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Not at all. It was not even mentioned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am seeking to address myself to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana was out of order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, I think so. The Senator from North Dakota asked me a question, and before I could answer it I found that I was blockaded.

However, Mr. President, I want to answer the question of the Senator from North Dakota because it is a very important consideration in determining this matter.

The making of tariff laws can be and should be regulated by Congress, but the proposition here is based upon the fact that it will not be regulated by Congress but by this board. That is the trouble. According to the belief of the lovers of our own country and its people that they are entitled to the first consideration in the making of laws, the tariff should be so high as to include all these classes. In other words, as I said on a former occasion in discussing this question here, the tariff wall should be above the highest tide. Why, a 10-foot wall will not protect the valley against a 12-foot tide any better than a 1-foot wall would protect it. As some one said in discussing the question here, a 16-inch boot top will not enable you to cross a ford of 20 inches of water dry-shod any more than would a boot top of 3 inches.

Between these extremes of cost the cost to the poorly equipped and yet justly entitled citizen is one thing. It is based upon the imperfection of his machinery. It is based upon the fact that he has neither the ability nor should he have the necessity of expending a large amount of money upon his mill in order that he might compete with the larger mills of perfect equipment.

For instance, in the production of sugar from beets it requires an investment of several hundred thousand dollars, but when that investment is made sugar can be produced cheaper than it could be produced by the sugar mills operated upon individual endeavor and capital anywhere in the country. They can drive them out of business because of the quantity of raw material which they can convert into the articles of commerce. Suppose you were to base the profit that might be made and recognized as legitimate upon the operations of these large sugar mills, what would become of the thousands, perhaps many, many thousands, of the smaller mills in the country?

The same is true of the iron-working furnaces. There are little furnaces up here in the Allegheny and Blue Ridge Mountains and in other sections of the country that are not equipped with the modern equipment of the large iron furnaces and can not produce their product at anything like the cost of the large mill. Now, upon the profits of which of these two manufacturers is the commission to base its conclusion as to how high a tariff should be?

We are drifting toward that condition of affairs where the duties of Congress are to be discredited at every turn in favor of a board of laymen. It is a dangerous drift of opinion. It is a charge against the ability of Congress to enact the laws for the people. It amounts to a confession on the part of Congress that it is unable to enact the necessary laws when it delegates the duties that rest upon it to some board merely that it may be easier.

What is the result of such a concession? This commission, working like a mole underground, accountable to no one, may report and it may not. It may withhold information under the provisions of this bill, but it is working away like a mole, gathering something to be used as a basis for legislation. What then? Senators who have served here long enough to know how these measures go through the committees and are adopted in the Senate know that information, so much of it as might go to the Committee on Finance, would go there. They would give Congress so much of it as they might under the law. They would base their action in the way of recommendation of legislation upon that information which had been doled out to them by the commission and a finance bill would come in here providing the protection that the people are entitled to against competition in their own markets, and we would be told with the gesture of eloquence that the committee had given it great consideration. We would be told that the facts had all been ascertained by this board and we would be met with a shrug of impatience if we insisted or were persistent in insisting that we should have the same information the committee had in order that we could judge of the wisdom of the committee's action.

That would be the position. Behind it all would be retreat of the committee to the information that was doled out to them, and the Senate would be told that this information had been whispered by the oracle of this board to them in secret with a pledge that it could not be printed.

That is not in accord with the principles of this Government. The American people want to know the facts upon which their representatives act, and they are entitled to know them. There is no proceeding of this body that may properly be withheld from the people, nor is there any information upon which this body acts that may properly be withheld from the people, with the exception of information upon which this body acts in executive session, wherein the affairs of other countries are concerned and intrusted to our confidence in order that we may deal with them without disclosing matters that other countries desire should be kept secret.

I want no tariff board to do that which we have for a hundred years performed for ourselves without any serious inconvenience or expense to the public or to ourselves. No man should sit in this body who is not equipped with the intelligence requisite to enable him to perform the duties pertaining to his office. If he finds the people have overestimated his ability to intelligently participate in the making of laws he should advise them of that fact and they could then perhaps correct the evil. Whenever a Member of Congress requires the assistance of some laymen to enable him to intelligently perform his duties, it is then time that the people were notified of that fact.

It is said that it is convenient. The argument of convenience has no place in this body. It is said that it will result in saving the committees a great deal of work. The committees can protect themselves against overburdens by the employment of better men than would ever sit upon this board.

There seems to be so much excellent conversation going on that I hardly feel it necessary to contribute to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please take their seats.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to make a formal motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I ask——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota first addressed the Chair.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I know the purpose of the Senator from Minnesota, and if this discussion were to proceed any length of time I would cheerfully yield, but the Senator from Indiana desires to ask that the unfinished business be laid aside.

Mr. NELSON. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to take up the agricultural appropriation bill, House bill 31596.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 31596) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the Secretary may be instructed before the bill leaves the desk to correct all totals that may be changed by amendments during the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the reading of the bill be resumed at page 15, where we left off when the bill was under consideration on a former day.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill on page 15, line 22.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 15, line 23, after the word "thousand," to insert "seven hundred and fifty," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Animal Industry, $1,654,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the end of the paragraph beginning in line 1 on page 22.

Mr. WARREN. In order to adjust that clause with the amendment proposed by the committee at the end thereof, I move, on page 22, line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-eight" and insert "forty-two."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, line 3, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "thirty-eight" and to insert "forty-two," so as to make the clause read:

To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice, $142,920.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Bureau of Plant Industry," on page 22, line 3, after the word "dollars," to insert "Provided, That of the amount hereby appropriated the sum of $4,000 shall be used in agricultural reconnoissance work in Alaska," so as to make the clause read:

To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice, $142,920: Provided, That of the amount hereby appropriated the sum of $4,000 shall be used in agricultural reconnoissance work in Alaska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 10, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two hundred and seventy-eight thousand and fifty-five" and insert "three hundred and fifty thousand," so as to make the clause read:

For the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil, $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty-six" and insert "seventy-six," so as to make the clause read:

For the investigation and improvement of methods of crop production under semiarid or dry-land conditions, $76,730.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 18, to increase the total appropriation for general expenses of the Bureau of Plant Industry from $1,352,321 to $1,444,266.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 19, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Bureau of Plant Industry from $1,972,471 to $2,064,416.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of the following clause, in lines 8 and 9, on page 41:

Nez Perce National Forest, Idaho, $23,036.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire as to the item for the Nez Perce Forest Reserve. What is the appropriation for in that case?

Mr. WARREN. The appropriation for the Nez Perce Reservation amounts to $23,036.

Mr. HEYBURN. What is it for?

Mr. WARREN. We have no information as to what this money is to be expended for, other than that there is a supervisor on that, or on that and the adjoining reservation, and, of course, the foresters are there.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is an entirely separate and distinct enumeration of the appropriations for foresters.

Mr. WARREN. As to the controlling ones; yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; as to all of them. There is another place in the bill where foresters are especially provided for. I only want to say that there are some singular conditions existing in the Forestry Service. For instance, the foresters engage in killing animals under the bounty law of the State. They collect large sums of money from the State for killing wild animals, and at the same time draw their salaries from the Government.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator what is the class of animals for which the State pays a bounty—wolves, I suppose—and the more of those animals they kill the better for the country.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; that class of animals. First a private reserve is created upon which no one is allowed to shoot but the foresters. They kill the wild animals on that reserve, and then they collect from the State for killing those animals, so that they have what might be called, to use a very homely term, a "private snap." They create the reserve and prohibit everybody else from killing the animals, and then they kill them and draw very large sums of money from our State.

Mr. HALE. From the State?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; from the State. They draw two salaries, one under this bill and one from the State.

Mr. WARREN. The reason I asked the Senator as to what animals they pay a bounty for killing was——

Mr. HEYBURN. They are enumerated—for coyotes, wolves, and so forth.

Mr. CULLOM. What do they get for a scalp?

Mr. WARREN. In this same bill we are providing in a way for the preservation of certain game animals. Under the laws of the State of Wyoming a bounty is paid for killing destructive animals, but money is also paid for the preservation of game animals. I suppose it is the same in Idaho. I did not know that the foresters were engaging in the business of killing wild animals and collecting bounty on them.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have a list of the bounties paid. They also have bird men to preserve the birds of the West. That extends clear back to the State of Illinois or farther east. They have a class of employees whose business it is to protect various kinds of fancy birds, and they are engaged in that in the interest of retaining the natural resources of the country, music being one of them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho says that these wardens have the exclusive right to kill on the forest reservations?

Mr. HEYBURN. I said they exercise it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They exercise exclusive right on the forest reservations?

Mr. HEYBURN. No man may enter a forest reserve without a permit from the forester.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it possible that others are not permitted to hunt on these reserves?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not at all. You must have a permit or you can not do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have grown a little callous. Other affairs press upon us here, but this is a subject which should be ventilated.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], in the Sixtieth Congress, when we were appropriating about one hundred and some odd thousand dollars, I think, for this work, then inquired as to where this would lead and whether it was the beginning of a great expensive bureau. We were met with all sorts of assurances that after four years the forest reserves would not only be self-sustaining, but would contribute to the Treasury of the United States. Now, there is in this bill an appropriation for this service of nearly $8,000,000.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In connection with the remarks of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], I should like to put in the RECORD the statement that this bill carries for the Forestry Service the amount of $4,672,900.

Mr. WARREN. Other items added make the total somewhat more than that, I will say to my colleague, if we take into account emergency allotments.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In addition to that, it carries another million dollars in another item, and a bill which comes over here to-day from the House of Representatives carries a deficiency appropriation of $900,000, coming over from last year in excess of the appropriation we gave them then of between five and six million dollars. So that the total amount appropriated for the Forestry Service this year and this week amounts to over $7,000,000.

I merely desired to make that statement in connection with the remarks made by the Senator from Idaho that this was supposed to be a self-sustaining service.

Mr. WARREN. I may say, in that connection, that we have recently passed a forestry bill which carries from ten to eleven million dollars. I refer to the so-called Appalachian Forest bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And there is no knowing what the future possibilities of that bill may be.

Mr. WARREN. Only a word, Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Can the Senator tell how much money has been spent for the Forestry Service during the last 10 years?

Mr. WARREN. The annual amount has not been large until recent years. The first general appropriation was $100,000, I believe, and was carried in the sundry civil bill; but if we are going into the business of buying forests—private lands—in the eastern country, as provided, and manning them, I will not pretend to say how far we may go as to the amount that will finally make up the total of the forestry expenses of the United States.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. OVERMAN. In a moment. The Senator from Wyoming speaks of the money that is being expended in the Eastern States.

Mr. KEAN. I want to say to the Senator from Wyoming that not a dollar has been spent on forest reserves in the East.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want merely to say to the Senator from Wyoming that there is as much spent in the West in one year for forestry as will be appropriated for all time to come for the Southern Appalachian Reserve, and there is as much appropriated in this bill as will be appropriated for all time to come for that reserve.

I see, on page 40, in line 23, in regard to the Nebraska National Forest, that there is a proviso that certain trees might be furnished from the nurseries of the national forest. Is the Government in the nursery business?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming and others. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of all the money appropriated for all these forests, is a part for the purpose of keeping up nurseries?

Mr. HEYBURN. What kind of nurseries?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know. I am trying to get some information. What is being done with this money? It seems to me a great amount of money. The Senator says seven or eight million dollars are being appropriated. There ought not anything to be mentioned whether the forests are in the East or the West. It ought not to be mentioned upon this floor. Simply pass the bill. When you talk about spending money, you are spending five times as much money out there as you are here. What I am asking is—to get some information—whether the Government is in the nursery business in all these forests, spending millions of dollars raising trees? What sort of trees are being raised out there—fruit trees?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think the Senator from North Carolina misapprehended my purpose in calling attention to this appropriation.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope I did.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. A great many people from the West are inclined to complain of the tremendous amounts that are being appropriated from year to year to be expended by the Forestry Service. They do that upon two grounds. First, upon the ground that it is an extravagant use of the public funds, and second, upon the ground that for nearly every dollar that is so expended another dollar is expended side by side with it that stops the development of that country; and I miss my guess if the Senator from North Carolina and those who acted with him in the Appalachian business will not live to rue the time when they have put it within the power of the General Government and the Agricultural Department and the Forestry Service to handle their lands upon this eastern coast.

We complain of it bitterly. We complain of it because it has bound up our water powers, because it has precluded us from the development we ought to have, because we can not use the resources that nature has put down at our very doors. The Senator from North Carolina will find that in his Appalachian bill he has been forging the same sort of fetters for his own country, or I will miss my guess.

But the Senator asked a question a few moments ago in regard to appropriations that have been made. This matter is of little moment—started as a small tree. It did not amount to much. It was simply a little experiment as to what the Government could do with trees, but it has been growing in spite of all our warnings. Not a man in this body has voted to approve these increased appropriations, not a man has voted to put these shackles on our industry but has done so with his eyes open and knowing what he was doing. It has never passed through the Senate but that it has been met by the determined and indignant opposition of those upon whom it was forced.

This thing that was not to grow; this thing that was to become a beneficence; this thing that was to be a blessing to us all and was to pay its own way, that was not to fatten upon the Treasury of the United States—this is what it has done: In the year 1900 there was an appropriation of $48,520, not very much, a mere experiment to see what could be done to protect our watersheds. No question then of gain to the Government by exploiting our resources; no question then of setting the price of lumber over half of this continent; no question then as to the money that was to be taken from the inhabitants of that country for the free grass God raised from the soil; not a question of that sort, but a question of the benevolent, paternal, governmental control, because, forsooth, the people in that country knew not how to husband their own resources, because they did not know what was best for them and needed a guardian.

And from that has grown the appropriations, from the $48,000 in 1900 it doubled in 1901. It doubled again in 1902. It doubled again in 1903. No arithmetical progression, but geometrical progression from start to finish.

In 1903, $291,860; in 1904, $366,864; in 1905, $545,282; in 1906, $1,642,000; and in 1907, $2,757,000.

I want these figures heeded. In 1908, $2,304,000; in 1909, $3,989,000; in 1910, $4,682,000; in 1911, $5,051,000, and to-day this service is passing through the Congress of the United States, in addition to the more than $5,000,000, $900,000 on a deficiency bill that they have expended in violation of the law.

Now, do Senators wonder when every dollar that has been expended by the Government of the United States has been an absolute injury to the country which it is sought to protect; that every year, notwithstanding this great Forestry Service, which spreads is protecting care over our western forests, finds our forest fires more and more destructive? Let the people who live in that country protect their forests, and they will protect them. Let the people in that country fight the fires, and they will put them out. But every time you have taken from the men who are bred to the soil the authority to do with their natural resources as the necessities require, as their experience determines, not only do you take away that the loss of which injures them, but you put in the power of those who know little or nothing about the subject matter the authority to deal with things in such a way that it brings destruction to their own cause and to people as well.

I want to put these figures in the RECORD, so that the Members of the Senate may know—and may vote with their eyes open—that they are spending as much upon the Forestry Service of this Nation, against the protests of those who live within gunshot of the forests, against the protests of men who are as patriotic, who are as honest, who are as earnest as ever crossed this continent, who know what is right, who know how to handle these matters—in the face of their protests you are making a drain upon the Treasury of the United States that is absolutely without excuse, and the $900,000 to which I have called attention has been expended absolutely in spite of the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question before he sits down. The Senator read for each year the figures. I should like to know what is the grand total?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The grand total?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes. Since 1900.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Twenty-one million nine hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. OVERMAN. I mentioned it as over ten million. That is over twice as much as I thought.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The amount appropriated each year for permanent improvements was $1,975,000.

Mr. NELSON. I rise simply to respond to an inquiry made by the Senator from North Carolina, which I think the Senator from Wyoming in his able remarks has not responded to. It is the question of nurseries.

For salaries and field and station expenses, including the maintenance of nurseries, collecting seed, and planting, necessary for the use, maintenance, and protection of the national forests named below.

I find among the appropriations $25,000 for the Chugach Forest Reserve in Alaska. That is in the southern part of Alaska, opposite the Gulf of Alaska. Over half, two-thirds perhaps, of that reserve, consists chiefly of barren mountains, icebergs, dead and living glaciers, and old moraines.

Now, it is conceived that it would be an elegant place to establish a nursery at the foot of those glaciers, for the reason that the young plants would have an abundance of moisture there, as those glaciers thaw out in summer.

Then, more than that, after they get the little plants started at the foot of the glaciers they can have those old dead glaciers or moraines planted over with this nursery stock and raise a valuable addition to the timber supply of Alaska.

Mr. OVERMAN. Perhaps it is for raising moss.

Mr. NELSON. They can raise tundra over there, too. Another thing, and I learned that in my younger days when I worked in a nursery where we did a little grafting—— [Laughter.]

Mr. WARREN. I wish, to preserve the peace, that the Senator will not commit himself in any manner. [Laughter.]

Mr. NELSON. I see Senators are swift to get a wrong impression on the question of grafting. I meant that in an innocent sense; and I was about to explain that when we made what is called root grafting, in order to keep the grafted pieces in good shape and moist, when we put them in the ground we wanted a little moss around them.

Now, there is another advantage up in Alaska. They can go to work and graft trees, and until they get them set out and get the moisture from the thawing glaciers, they can take that tundra, covered in the ice there, and wrap it around these graft stems, and in that way I think we can establish a nursery out there in the Chugach Forest Reserve in southern Alaska that will supply all the Pacific coast. I am even in hopes of getting some of the grafts and stems in Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 46, in line 17, after "fires," to insert "and insect infestation," and in line 19, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which sum $35,000 shall be immediately available," so as to read:

For fighting forest fires and insect infestation and for other unforeseen emergencies, $135,000, of which sum $35,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. HEYBURN. That item interests me. I saw them fighting fires last summer——

Mr. WARREN. This is insect infestation.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; fighting fires.

Mr. WARREN. No; insect infestation.

Mr. HEYBURN. I saw a section of the country burning to a very large extent, in which not a fire ever started in the neighborhood of a settlement. There was not a storm of lightning during the period the fire was in progress. I happened to be there.

Mr. HALE. Forest fires?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. Parties wanted me to bring the facts to Congress, and I told them that this burden had grown so heavy that I did not feel that I could stem the tide here.

It is so appalling and so discouraging to a man who cares for his Government that it is very difficult, after all these years in which we have contended and sought to bring some comprehension of this subject to the people, to enter upon it.

Now, about those fires last summer. It is a very important point where the fires started. Fire fighters they talk about! I saw them; poor fellows picked up among the unemployed around towns, timid as rabbits, some of them, and those who were not were as vicious as wolves. These were good men, if they could get anything to do. I saw them go out to fight fires. Of course, when you speak of a fire fighter you imagine a man like a Viking going out to conquer nature's forces. You saw these poor, little, stoop-shouldered fellows going around the streets, some of them with scarcely covering on their feet. They would go out with shovels or axes or any implement of warfare that might be furnished them, and they had no more idea of how to use it than the untutored savage.

Mr. HALE. Fans.

Mr. HEYBURN. Fans probably were not suggested to them. But I saw them come in. I saw some of them come in wrapped in blankets, 80-odd, into our city. I saw them lying on the floor of my office. I saw them lying where they could find room to put them. Then I saw the necessity of housing those people, and we provided a place for them to sleep and blankets to roll themselves up in, and with food to eat until the regular organization could pick it up.

Mr. HALE. Do you mean the settlers?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the settlers were driven from their homes by the fires that were started beyond their homes and swept through the country.

Of course, the papers exaggerated the loss immensely. The loss of life and property was bad enough, but it was not as pictured. I had papers, I think, from this city sent me which told of flames 30 feet high and 12 miles in length, a solid sheet of flames, destroying the city of Wallace. I was there during all that time. You would have to have somebody point out in that city where the fire was. All of the hillsides that were burned, while, as compared with a garden patch, they are large areas, were, as compared with the public desert out there, but garden patches.

By public desert I mean a land that produces nothing and that has been reduced to a condition where it is not liable ever to. It produces a home and a playground for a lot of idlers, for which we are appropriating four or five million dollars to-day. It produces a home and an occupation for a lot of favorites who otherwise might starve to death, and it may have an element of humanity in it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator from Idaho have any idea of the total number of men employed in this service?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should have to look up the report. I have no doubt the report tells how many men. But it is an army of men. Somewhere in the neighborhood of 12,000 men.

Mr. OVERMAN. I see they are appropriating from $8,000 to $17,000 for every one of these forests. Is all that money expended in hiring men—such men as you describe?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I was speaking of the hour of emergency. Ordinarily these are about as neat and trim and well-selected a lot of young fellows as you ever saw. I have referred to them often, and it is no exaggeration to say those men are neatly uniformed and that they claim special privileges and rights for themselves as against the citizens of the country, and they have them under the law. Congress in its hour of forgetfulness has enabled them to take possession of a third of a State and administer it; and when you are reading all these names of forest reserves you are simply reading the subdivisions into which they have divided this country, and they are proceeding to enlarge it.

Mr. OVERMAN. But of these 12,000 men——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I do not want to interrupt these pleasantries, but I ought to say that the regular employees are between three and four thousand men. Of course, in cases of great conflagrations, additional men are hired, but the regular force is something over 3,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose that is so——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to know something about it.

Mr. WARREN. That includes, of course, the overhead charges, the men employed in Washington, and the full force.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senate ought to know how this great amount of money is being spent. It is not disbursed in buying forests and in keeping up forests. Why should it take so many men at such great salaries? If there are only 4,000 men employed and about $5,000,000 is expended to pay the salaries, they must get big salaries. Or is the money spent in some other way, in nurseries, raising fruit trees?

Mr. HEYBURN. That nursery question is a pleasantry of the most unpleasant kind.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do you not think the Senate ought to know something about it? We people who do not live out there do not know anything about it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am delighted that the Senator from North Carolina has awakened to a realization that the Senate should know something about it.

Mr. OVERMAN. We know there are $5,000,000 being spent out there each year on the forests, and I for one would like to know how it is being spent. I do not like to vote for appropriations unless I know something about where the money goes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the Senator's interest will continue to grow.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina, I will say that these forests are now simply an infant industry. They are going to progress. As to the number of people employed, as the chairman says, it is between three and four thousand now. But I can give to the Senator from North Carolina the opinion as expressed by the most eminent forester in the United States, the former head of this bureau, in an address before the Geographic Society some years ago, when we had about two-thirds of the acreage in forests that we now have, that the real, proper care of those forests would require the employment of about 117,000 men.

So the Senator from North Carolina can readily figure, if with the limited number we employ now we expend $7,000,000, how much we will be required to spend when this system reaches its real development and 118,000 or 120,000 men will be required.

Mr. OVERMAN. It will bankrupt the Treasury.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to proceed just a little further.

There is a most exaggerated opinion in the minds of people as to the value of these lands. There is not an acre of land in the forest reserves in the United States—I say not an acre; there might be some exceptions, but I will rest it upon that—the timber upon which is worth $100. You might imagine that these forest lands grew timber worth thousands of dollars per acre. The average value of the timber on forest reserves actually timbered is less than $40 an acre; and I will undertake to say that the greater part of that land will produce a single crop of cabbages worth more than the timber on it.

You know when you multiply atoms you can get very large figures if you multiply them enough, and they always talk about the millions of acres of forests and then give you the total as to the timber on it. I know the scale of timber upon millions of acres of land. I have had it passed before my notice. It is a matter that you can obtain anywhere where these lands are—in the land offices, the surveyor general's office, the State board offices. The very best timber land in the United States, the white-pine timber lands, the timber upon which is worth more than any other is probably the Marble Creek district.

Mr. HALE. Where is that?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is in Idaho, and it is conceded to be the finest body of white pine in the world. Any great timber man will tell you.

Mr. HALE. Where is that?

Mr. HEYBURN. That lies in this——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is about 40 by 60 miles. That is, of course, not in even lines, but that is approximately its size.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have heard the Senator very interestingly, and he speaks very interestingly on these matters and gives us information. We know nothing about it, and I have heard the senior Senator from Wyoming. We have this up every year. It seems to me the Senator ought to offer some amendment by which some of this money could be saved. Some Senators understand these questions. I do not understand them. I do not live there. But the Senator talks very interestingly, and I am inclined to go with him; but it is all talk. Why is not some bill or some amendment introduced here?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not a fair charge—that it is all talk. We have made amendments covering all these questions only to see Senators vote them down.

Mr. OVERMAN. Because they were not informed about the question.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have spent days in discussing it only to see Senators' minds occupied with other questions.

Return those forests, make them available to the settler, and all these questions will pass away. There is no citizenship in the forester. He is probably appointed from the District of Columbia or from some place where his sponsor lives. There is no citizenship. It adds nothing to the State. He does not bring property there. He does not pay taxes there, and this land pays no taxes and contributes nothing except a little sum that is provided if Congress has to violate the constitution of the State.

The constitution of the State says for what purpose school funds or the funds from the sale of timber lands shall be used. Congress goes in and says, "Well, we will use it for some other purpose."

Mr. HALE. Are not the foresters in Idaho citizens of the State?

Mr. HEYBURN. I expect there are some citizens of Idaho appointed foresters, but that simply withdraws them from profitable industrial enterprises and makes them range riders for the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, this question is of enough importance to occupy the attention of the Senate for a time I would not undertake to limit, but unless Senators are ready to wake up to the importance it would be merely to be voted down and probably add another million dollars. Four years ago when we had fought this question on the lines of truth and had presented it in such way as should have convinced any Senator, we were met with a ribald amendment that was sent over here merely to show us what the power was, adding another half a million dollars to the bill, without even prescribing what it was for. It was just legislative ribaldry. That is what we have met from the beginning. We are feeling no less earnest about it to-day.

If you do not want that country settled by industrious citizens and growing communities, what do you hold it for? As a fuel supply? How much have you drawn from it? Settlers know better what to do with that land than any theorists in the world. It sounds well to sit back here and build up a Utopian idea of great national forests which shall pour out mighty wealth to the people, and pour out wood and lumber in various ways. But they do not do it. There have been more trees falling down rotten with age in those forest reserves since they were created than there have been cut for use.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do not the forest reserves protect the water power and the water?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is so absolutely absurd that an intelligent man is not patient with it.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what has been said.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know it is being said.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to draw the Senator out on that point, because I do not understand it. I do not think this side of the Chamber understands it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, water power has no more value than the song of the birds, unless it is being utilized and applied.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, why have the forest reserves protect it?

Mr. HEYBURN. The forests do not protect the water power.

There is no water power merely because there is water, unless it is improved and applied. You have been creating forest reserves out there to protect water for the last 10 years, and the water would have been just as well protected without them. No one wanted to use it then. The water would have been there without them. It is there now. The water that is here to-day is somewhere else to-morrow. What we want is some one to come in there and develop the water power. I would rather offer a premium for its development than enact a law that would prevent its development. There is more nonsense talked about the water power on the public domain than should be expressed on all subjects on the earth combined. There is no sincerity behind it, in the first place. There is no intelligence behind it. Here is the water power of the falls of the Potomac River that has been flowing there for a century, and no one using it or wanting to use it. You can look out almost from the Capitol Building on the water power of the Potomac River. No one is making use of it. Why not? If our water power undeveloped in the mountains of our country is so precious, why is not this a precious heritage to the people of the District of Columbia?

They talk about reforestation. Why do they not reforest the lands between the city of Washington and Baltimore? We ride through on the Pennsylvania Railroad trains and look out and see scrub pines on those lands. They allow the things near home, the home of the Government, to go to wreck and ruin through neglect merely that they may engraft themselves upon our country. Talk about the word "graft;" there is no better application of it on earth. We have natural resources and prosperity, and these do-nothing people come and engraft themselves upon those conditions. They do not bring capital, they do not bring the strength of an industrious arm, but they bring there the sucker to draw from us to the amount of their living and their salary; that is all.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I would like to ask the Senator, for my own information, are not the headwaters of the streams held in the reserves in reservoirs or ponds or lakes?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, where the water has been appropriated, of course. We were going along very well, and had no talk of monopoly of water at all. We have been using water for mining and irrigation. We have made a provision in our constitution for its distribution and apportionment. We were going along there under as good a system of government as could be devised, when these grafters sought to engraft themselves upon us, in order that they might draw a salary which they would not otherwise be able to draw. That is grafting. That is a good definition of a grafter. A grafter is not a man who puts his hand in your till and takes your money. He is not a man who embezzles the funds of a bank or insurance company, because he does that under a very different principle. But a grafter is a man who attaches himself to some other person's prosperity and draws from him and contributes nothing. Neither are they taxpayers. They are lobbyists. In one part of the State, on the occasion of an election two years ago, they gave out, in violation of orders, doubtless, that they were instructed to see that the senior Senator from Idaho did not return. They can do that, and I speak it boldly, and they do not dare deny it, because if they did I would probably follow them up pretty closely. That shows what kind of men they sent there.

Now, you ask what we shall do. Return those lands to the public domain of the United States, that American citizens may make homes upon them; that they may discover and develop mines upon them. You say they belong to the people of all the country. Are not they a part of the people of the country as much as you are?

Here is another serious thing. There are no prospectors in the field to-day looking for mines. We are working the mines we had before this infamy was perpetrated.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood the forest reserves were all mountains, and you could not settle upon them; that these reserves are not lands upon which settlers could locate, but that they are mountains.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; Mr. President, I remember when I was a boy there was a map on the wall. It was Pelton's outline map of the United States, and it had the Rocky Mountains a series of chains of little tents, just a line of them from the Mexican border clear up through the United States. I used to think that those mountains were just as they appeared upon that map. I will disabuse the Senator's mind about that. It is in the mountains that the valleys are. There never were two mountains in the world without a valley. The Senator realizes that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Are those valleys in the reserves in the mountains?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly, they are. They delight in the valley because it makes a more comfortable home for the foresters to live in.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought it was only the mountain tops.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest that the Senator go out into that country this year if we have a vacation and just look it over once.

Mr. OVERMAN. It seems they ought to exempt the valleys from the forest reserves, so people could locate there and have homes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the question of mining is one that affects this country in a manner as far-reaching as any other public question. It was the mines in Nevada and Colorado that enabled this country to carry on its war and to pay its debt; that gave a substantial basis behind the bonds of the country. They produced during the war in Idaho from gold mines $200,000,000, and it was money when it was produced. It needed not to be coined or stamped; it was money. The same was going on down in Colorado and in Nevada and in California. They were pouring hundreds of millions of dollars into the circulation of the country. Now, what do we see to-day? The prospector has withdrawn. I could name a hundred prospectors whose names are famous in that great country. I will name a few of them. Take men like Comstock, who discovered the Comstock mines. I could name a hundred of them, but I do not want to put in a list of all the citizens of Idaho.

A Senator suggests to me that the bill should be passed, but I tell you sometimes it is better not to get a bill through with certain provisions in it. Take men like Jack Smith, and John King, and Mike Harlan, and N. S. Kellogg, who discovered the Bunker Hill mines. I could name them all. They have added more to the wealth of the country than all the bankers. The bankers develop no wealth to the country. They simply turn the money over to what they call a "kitty," into which goes the gold.

Mr. President, I am not going to take up much time in this matter, but I would feel that I had not performed a duty if I did not sound a note of warning here.

I want to say just a word more about those prospectors, because the gold mines, the silver and lead and copper mines of to-morrow depend upon those prospectors. As I have said here before, no geologist ever discovered a mine. There is not a mine on record discovered by a geologist that ever paid a dollar. They are not the class of men who produce mines. Suppose we have no new mines discovered, and they have withdrawn everything. Every class of country where mines are located they have withdrawn. Then they passed a foolish little innocent bill providing that the lands should be opened to location and purchase.

A mining prospector would no more start out on a search for mines, knowing that his work and his judgment had to be submitted to some forester as to its efficiency and validity, than he would start to climb a pole to reach the sky.

We succeeded in getting that question before the United States Supreme Court in the case of Harrington v. Chambers. The courts had held in some instances that this or that rule should determine whether or not a discovery was valid. The Supreme Court in that case said whenever a prospector or miner had found such indications of ore or mineral-bearing rock as indicated the presence of a lead he could locate a claim, and it is a valid claim. He is the man to judge, according to the Supreme Court of the United States. In a case in which I was counsel the court below undertook to qualify it by putting in the word "reasonably," that he might reasonably expect to lead to ore. The court said "no;" there is no limitation on that prospector; he is the fellow who went out there under the hardships for the purpose of finding that mine, and to have some smart grafter come along and draw fine lines as to whether or not his discovery is valid was intolerable.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to suggest that if you do not allow the lands on which there are mines and water power to be settled, how are they going to be developed? You can not get capital to develop mines or water power unless you give title to them. I do not think this Government will ever find any people to go out there with money to invest under any other condition.

Mr. HEYBURN. They have tied up all applications for mines and patents. They issued a sweeping order and withdrew every one in the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Was there any reason for that?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; there was no reason for it. They only wanted to do it.

Mr. President, I hope that the provisions of this bill in reference to making appropriations to perpetuate this infamy will be stricken out, and that we will open up the country to settlement.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will excuse me for interrupting him, the Senator from Missouri and others here are interested in this matter and want to know if it is true that people can not locate and own mines any more out in that country? Can not a prospector locate a mine and own it and develop it?

Mr. HEYBURN. He can not do it under any conditions that any prospector will endure or submit himself to. They have a law which says this land shall be open to exploration and settlement, and they have made a set of rules which we have here, every Member, which makes it absolutely impossible to secure the location of mining claims, and the prospectors have withdrawn and gone out of business.

I shall at the proper time move to strike out all of the provision with reference to this matter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am exceedingly anxious to conclude the consideration of this bill, but I can not refrain from making a few brief observations. One is that every man who grazes a domestic animal in a forest reserve pays for the privilege, and those who take timber and lumber from it pay for the same, and the income from these and other sources is about two millions a year.

Now, as to the West and the South and East: The West, as is shown in this bill, by forest reserves, covers about one-half of the United States.

As to the nursery provision, I understand there is an experiment station in one of the Nebraska reserves. The provision as to nurseries was put in on the floor of the House, I think, by an almost unanimous vote, in order that at that station free trees might be given to those living in the country adjoining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next amendment.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Forest Service," on page 46, line 17, after the word "fires," to insert "and insect infestation," and in line 19, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which sum $35,000 shall be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

For fighting forest fires and insect infestation and for other unforeseen emergencies, $135,000, of which sum $35,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I move to strike out of this bill all of the provisions of the clauses or the chapter providing for the payment of the expenses of these forest reserves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is to strike out, beginning on page 26, line 23, with the heading "Forest Service," down to the end of line 2 on page 50.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am in favor of the motion. I am not going to make a speech, but I am going to let the RECORD show that I did not propose the amendment in the sense of ridicule.

Mr. OVERMAN. Instead of striking out all of the items, will not the Senator go over each one and see what are absolutely necessary? I think he might probably get such an amendment through, but to strike out all of the items might involve more than is necessary.

Mr. HEYBURN. Nobody ever thought it necessary to make that inquiry in originating this scheme. It was simply originated because somebody thought it was right. The proper thing to do with this is to pull it up by the roots and throw it over the wall.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is another appropriation here of $500,000 for the improvement and building of roads and bridges.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, of course, that only emphasizes the ridiculous nature of this whole legislation. It reminds me of a lot of dissipated, half-drunken fox hunters jumping over the fences and trampling down the crops of the farmers. That is the kind of principle behind it. The way to do is not to remove the fence, but to remove the offenders.

Mr. President, I expect that it needs no prophet to tell the Senate what the result of this motion may be, but if Senators would give it the attention which they give to matters that affect their own constituencies and in their own homes, there would be no such legislation as this upon the statute books. It is based upon the assumption that the people who have the knowledge and the intelligence to go into a new country to open it up are not as intelligent as the drones who stay behind.

My amendment includes the matter that I object to. The whole spirit of these forest reserves, which are so expensive, is based upon the assumption that men in the West are not as patriotic and as observant of the law or care less for the interests of the country of which they are a part than they do in the East. That is all.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I thought the Senator from Idaho had finished. I do not wish to take his time.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I am going to sit down as soon as I get through.

Mr. WARREN. Very well. I will simply say that the motion which the Senator has made could hardly be entertained at this time, because it is not to amend an amendment of the committee, but to strike out a portion of the House bill which the committee has not reported to amend; and the unanimous consent in proceeding to the consideration of the bill was that it should be read for amendment, the committee amendments first to be considered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I realize that, and I am merely recording this amendment. It may be held under consideration until we are considering general amendments.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PILES. I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho if the $500,000 appropriation for roads in the forest reservations is included within his motion?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. The first thing that should be stopped is the building of roads by these foresters out of the Public Treasury of the United States from nowhere to nowhere, from one forester's camp to another. Perhaps one of the most ridiculous features of this whole performance is the construction of roads and trails for the foresters to ride over. Nobody else is allowed to ride over them; you are not allowed to come within a forest reserve and use those roads. They are taking public money to build private roads for their use, so that it will enable them to get quickly from one part to another.

Mr. PILES. I can not agree with the Senator from Idaho on the road proposition, because those roads through the forest reserves give aid to the settlers.

Mr. HEYBURN. To what settlers?

Mr. PILES. The settlers in the vicinity of the forest reserves. The settlers must use those roads in order to pass through the forest reserves. Having no jurisdiction over them, the State can not construct roads in the forest reserves. I hope the Senator will not attempt to strike out the appropriation for the building of roads in forest reserves which are of real benefit to the settlers in the several States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I can give the Senator from Washington some information. The Forest Service took possession of several hundred miles of road that the State had built, had issued bonds for, and had paid the bonds. They took possession of those roads; and they do not recognize the right of the State to use them or to exercise any control of them. One of the very first measures after Idaho began to settle up was for the building of a road from one end of it to the other. We built it, and the forest reserve has it now.

Mr. PILES. Do not others use those roads?

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand there may be roads through some little neck of a forest reserve that might be used; but people can not camp there and they can not feed their horses along the road. In our State I know of the fact—and I have it upon such authority as leaves no doubt about it—that they have actually sought to charge immigrants who were passing through the forest reserves over those roads for feeding and grazing their horses in those woods.

This is not a subject that a man can discuss calmly and dispassionately when he finds a situation confronting him that renders everything that he may say utterly useless. This is a difficult subject.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. STONE. I am desiring to vote on definite information, and I should like to know of the Senator from Idaho whether he intends by his motion to strike out everything in the bill relating to the Forestry Service? I do not know where the motion to strike out begins.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would strike out of the provision included within the scope of my motion only what relates to the officers who are there to do that which is best not done; that is all.

Mr. STONE. I am in a large degree in sympathy with a great deal of what the Senator says is his purpose. On page 49, ending with line 10, is a summing up of the total amount of appropriations made down to that point, being $2,699,420. Does the motion of the Senator from Idaho to strike out end at that point?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it ends at that point.

Mr. STONE. As reported by the Secretary, I understood that it went further, and ended at line 2, on page 50.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Secretary evidently misapprehended the amendment. The amendment offered was to strike out the amount which covers the general expenses of the Forestry Service, but that did not comprise within it a single amendment reported by the committee. The Secretary, as I understood him, must have misunderstood the Senator, and stated that the amendment was to strike out everything relating to forestry, which would be a matter of about double the amount which the Senator has just stated.

Mr. HEYBURN. My motion covered—and I had the bill before me then——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the motion is not in order at the present time, while the Senate is considering committee amendments, it having been agreed by unanimous consent that the committee amendments were first to be considered.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is an amendment that may be offered at any time and be considered later. If I can do so, it is my intention to shut off the appropriations that are intended for the destruction of our country, its interests, and its prosperity.

I am admonished that we ought not to take up the time of the Senate. You might as well be admonished not to resist against an attempt upon your life or property. They say, "Oh, no, do not disturb us; we want to do this in peace; we want to destroy you gracefully and quickly; but we do not want you to call attention to the fact at all." Well, that country is not inhabited by people with those predilections. Those people defended themselves against hardship and poverty and Indians and a lot of other things to go to that country; and they had an energy, an enterprise, and a manhood that enabled them to reach that country. They left behind a lot of drones—I do not mean all of those left behind were drones, but they left behind a lot of drones—that are to-day claiming the fruits of the labor of those pioneers. They made a country valuable that was not worth a nickel; they converted a solitude into a State. Those left behind then began to regret that they had not dragged their lazy limbs across the plains so as to share in the reward, and they sent out word, "Send us back the fruits of your victory;" and a senator has just suggested that we send them back about $2,000,000 of something that they never earned. They want what they and their ancestors have accumulated in this country, and they want in addition what the pioneers have made. They want two portions, and they would take 20 if they could get them for nothing. They are that kind of citizens. They have no suggestion in their minds or hearts of real patriotism. There is not an intelligent, thoughtful suggestion in the minds of those people who want to ride roughshod over us as to the equities of the situation. They only know that they see some one who is on the way to prosperity, and they want to hitch him to their chariot wheels and rob him as they drag him beside their chariot.

What do they propose to give us for it? They exclude us from the land at our doors, the heritage that was intended for the pioneer. This country was based upon the principle of pioneerism. Pioneers came over here and landed along the Atlantic coast, leaving the comforts and traditions of their lives and of the lives of those before them, in order to come here, not to enjoy some new, well-furnished house, but to carve a future for themselves out of the forests of New England and Virginia and Maryland and Pennsylvania. Suppose that a forest reserve had covered the States of New York and Pennsylvania and Massachusetts in those days; I suppose the settlers would, like animals, have dug holes in the ground to live in, because they would not have been allowed to use the timber to build themselves houses. Put yourselves in the place of the pioneers of the West. They have done in 10 years what it has taken you 100 years to do. The State of Idaho is further advanced in 10 years than any State in New England was at the end of a century; yet, through a spirit of jealous grasping and enviousness, you would stop our growth because, forsooth, the day may come when we will be as big as you are. I will be content with the same size. I am not always claiming or desiring to go above everybody else. I want to stand on a level with them at both ends, my head and my feet.

This amendment to strike out this infamy, when we come to vote on it, ought to be adopted. It is costing the Government of the United States not only what they spend, but it is costing them the citizenship that is represented by the possibilities of that country. With all these difficulties and these obstructions the State of Idaho made a gain of 100.3 per cent in the last decade, and she would have doubled that increase had it not been that a third of her territory is shut up and made a solitude.

The foresters are a trifling crew. Last year I called the attention of the Senate to their methods. There are men who stand before national geographical societies and other learned societies with impressive titles and tell them how the world ought to be run. They sent men out there into that country for the purpose of gathering seed to plant in the nurseries, and the seeds were gathered by robbing the squirrels' nests. That is what they did. Forty-five bushels of seed from a little area of country right near my home were gathered by men who had no more conscience than to rob the squirrels' nests, and they turned the seed over to the Government with a full knowledge of where they had procured it. I speak of it merely to illustrate the class of men they have in the service.

Then they take possession of men's homes. I have in my mind now one especially beautiful cottage located upon a high plateau above the river near Evergreen, in the State of Idaho. A man had built it there on unsurveyed land. Had it been surveyed land he would have bought it from the Government and been glad to do so; but they came along and they said, "This is too good for you; we will take it," and they put him out and took possession of it for what they called "administrative purposes." They did the same thing to another man who had been living in his home for 20 years upon unsurveyed land, while Congress was refusing to make appropriations for surveys. I put before the Committee on Appropriations yesterday an amendment to a bill authorizing the expenditure of money for those surveys in order that the Government may not have an excuse for putting men out of their homes on the ground that the lands are not surveyed. Every acre ought to be surveyed. If a railroad wants its land grant surveyed, as they sometimes do, they survey the lands to the extent of the demand. Of course the railroads do not want their land grants surveyed unless, in exceptional cases, because they would have to pay taxes on the land if they enter it. They have lands in our State worth millions of dollars upon which they pay no taxes whatever, because they have managed it so that the lands are not surveyed.

Mr. President, I have very little hope of reformation in this hour. This is not the hour of reforms. It is the hour of chaos—political chaos, governmental chaos—and I will wait until conditions settle down and men begin to think.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will we have an opportunity to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have offered it, and it will be considered in the regular order of business after committee amendments are disposed of. Then the amendment will be before the Senate.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 16, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four hundred and ninety" and insert "five hundred and five," so as to make the clause read:

Improvement of the National Forests: For the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, telephone lines, cabins, fences, and other permanent improvements necessary for the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of the National Forests, $505,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 18, after the word exceed," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen," so as to make the clause read:

Not to exceed 15 per cent of the total of all sums appropriated under "General Expenses, Forest Service," and under "Improvement of the National Forests," may be used in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture as provided above under "General Expenses, Forest Service," and under "Improvement of the National Forests," for all expenses necessary for the general administration of the Forest Service.

Mr. WARREN. In line 8, I move to strike out "sale" and insert "scale."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not understand at what part of the pure-food act this provision is supposed to come in. The language of the proposed amendment is that the act be amended so as to provide, and so forth, but it does not appear from this whether this particular language is to be incorporated into the act and to be in the provision or not.

Mr. WARREN. The act, of course, is not now before us, but it seems to me that the meaning of the amendment can not be misunderstood.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No.

Mr. WARREN. I think it will cover the purposes for which it is intended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But should it not state that the pure-food act in a certain section of it is to be amended to read as follows?

This is simply a general provision that it shall be amended to provide that; but it does not. In other words, is the proposition to insert this language in the pure-food act?

Mr. WARREN. No; this will be a later act, which in its effect will amend the other. It is a very trifling matter. It is only to bring in a class of medicines and practitioners not covered, probably inadvertently, by the original act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand that; but my point is this: Is there to be a separate bill introduced hereafter to amend the pure-food act in general, as stated here? If so, what is the use of this provision?

Mr. WARREN. A pure-food act has already passed. Another one is being considered. This, while not having reference particularly to the second bill, is intended now to bring up the subject, so that it may be covered as to the first, and its substance may be included in the second, as I understand the committee is liable to do.

Mr. LODGE. I think that provision is perfectly clear. It authorizes the officers of the Agricultural Department, who have to enforce the pure-food act, to use as their drug standard the homeopathic pharmacopœia as well as the pharmacopœia of the United States. That is the whole thing. It is simply an authority to them to use a second standard in addition to the one they now have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Roseman, professor, department of preventive medicine and hygiene at Harvard, and the other from Edwin O. Jordan, of the University of Chicago, editor of the Journal of Infectious Diseases.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF PREVENTIVE MEDICINE AND HYGIENE, HARVARD MEDICAL SCHOOL,
Boston, Mass., February 25, 1911.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I desire to state that I am thoroughly in favor of a factory inspection of eggs and briefly give you herewith a few reasons for this opinion.

There is at present no satisfactory scientific standard by which the quality of an egg may be determined; we must therefore largely rely upon the evidence of our senses. Bacteriology, chemistry, and the microscope afford rather meager and incomplete knowledge so far as eggs are concerned. A good egg may contain many bacteria; a thoroughly bad egg may actually contain none. The chemical products of decomposition are often detected more readily and more quickly by the sense of smell or taste than by laboratory methods. It would therefore seem a reasonable protection to the consumer to have a Government supervision over eggs along the same lines that the Government inspects and supervises the killing, preparation, and packing of meat and meat food products.

Eggs differ from other animal foods in that the surplus egg crop is largely limited to about three or four months in the year. It is therefore necessary to preserve the excess production of this important article of diet in order to supply the demand during the remaining eight or nine months. In my judgment, the best method of preserving eggs is by refrigeration. At a temperature far below the freezing point (substantially 0° F.) at which canned eggs are ordinarily kept, all bacterial action and decomposition practically ceases. Eggs in the shell must be kept above the freezing point for well-known reasons; in consequence, shell eggs deteriorate in cold storage. It will be seen that there is a wide difference in temperature at which canned eggs and shell eggs are kept in cold storage—a difference in favor of the former.

It is therefore desirable that eggs should first be graded by candling, then broken out, and again carefully inspected at the breaking table before they are placed in cold storage, all under official supervision. Such an inspection would correspond to the ante-mortem and post-mortem inspections of cattle and would be a protection to the consumer and be welcomed by all honest dealers engaged in the egg industry.

Another very satisfactory method, from the sanitary standpoint, of preserving eggs is by drying them after they have been broken out in bulk. In this dried condition they may be preserved for a very long time, just as other dried food products are preserved.

Canned eggs—that is, eggs that are broken out and frozen in bulk—as well as dried eggs should, in my judgment, be labeled, sealed, and dated under Government surveillance when they are placed in cold storage, and perhaps again when they are taken out. Proper labeling and dating applies, of course, equally to all canned foods and especially to foods preserved in cold storage. The consumer is entitled to this knowledge.

The Government inspection of eggs at the factory would not displace bacterial, chemical, or other scientific methods that may now exist or hereafter be devised to detect whether the eggs have subsequently become "decomposed, filthy, or putrid." There would, however, be little chance for contamination provided the eggs are placed in a satisfactory container and properly sealed, and therefore there would be little occasion in actual practice to enforce the expensive, harassing, and time-consuming methods now in vogue to detect adulteration or misbranding after it occurs. Preventive measures which would be assured by factory inspection are infinitely better from all standpoints than detective methods after the food has entered interstate commerce.

Eggs have a good health record. There is no known infection of the hen transmissible to man. The only way in which bulk eggs could become seriously infected would be through insanitary or uncleanly methods. Factory inspection would largely safeguard the consumer against such possibility, however slight.

Sanitarians have long ago come to the conclusion that the chemical and bacteriological examination of water as it flows from the tap affords no satisfactory safeguard. The water should be kept clean and pure at its source by a system of inspection and control. The same principle applies to milk. The bacteriological and chemical examination of milk occasionally detects samples that are old, watered, adulterated, or dirty. However, it is now well recognized that the best way to provide for a safe and clean milk is through inspection at the source of its production. The same principles apply to meat, eggs, and all other food products. I am especially interested in preventive measures and believe that the factory inspection of eggs would accomplish good results along these lines.

From the standpoint of the economist and sociologist it is important to preserve the large amount of valuable food (eggs) which nature furnishes in excess of the demand during the spring and summer months in our agricultural districts for metropolitan use during the fall and winter seasons. The principles of conservation of our resources and the thoughts upon the increased cost of living teach us that we are dealing with a subject that is theoretically sound and practically important.

The eggshell is porous and brittle; it readily absorbs odors, and bacteria often penetrate it. The preservation and transportation of eggs in the shell, therefore, is neither economical nor entirely satisfactory from a sanitary standpoint. Eggs that are carefully opened and graded by experts in factories under Government surveillance may be placed in clean, sterile containers and frozen or dried so that further decomposition may be averted, and the loss and deterioration incident to shell eggs prevented.

The preservation of eggs and a system of factory inspection where the eggs are examined, graded, opened, frozen, dried, or otherwise handled for the market would be an advantage to the consumer, the producer, and would greatly facilitate the sanitary authorities charged with the administration of our pure-food laws. It is my opinion, therefore, that legislation providing for a factory inspection of eggs is worthy of your careful consideration and encouragement.

Very truly, yours,

M. J. ROSEMAN,
Professor Preventive Medicine and Hygiene.

THE JOURNAL OF INFECTIOUS DISEASES,

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Senate Chamber, Washington D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am deeply interested as a sanitarian and student on public-health questions in your proposed amendment covering factory inspection of canned and dried eggs. I sincerely trust that this amendment may receive favorable consideration. My reasons are briefly these:

1. The experience of the last 20 years in sanitation and preventive medicine has shown that it is much easier and more effective to control the sanitary quality of food substances at or near their source than in retail markets at the door of the consumer. This has become particularly clear in the case of milk supply where seizure of a few cans of milk in a large city may occasionally reveal adulteration or fraud, but never goes to the root of the matter, namely, the original character of the milk and the sanitary conditions under which the milk was produced. Disease germs can not be detected in the bottle of milk delivered to the householder. Inspection of the farm and farmer's family, however, would in many cases result in cutting off all danger at its source and in preventing not 1 but 100 families from becoming infected with typhoid fever or other milk-borne diseases. For these reasons sanitarians universally recognize the prime importance of controlling conditions of collection, transportation, and distribution in contrast to an attempt to examine the contents of individual cans and milk bottles. The latter method, even if it could be carried out, would be not only wasteful, but relatively ineffective. Such principles which are of universal acceptance as regards milk should be applied as soon as possible to the supervision of other food substances. I may add at this point that inspection and control of the sources of water supply has long been recognized as more essential than attempts to control on the basis of merely analytical data.

2. In the case of egg supply the existence of a surplus for one-third of the year and a corresponding scarcity in the fall and early winter make necessary the adoption of some process of preservation for this important element of food supply. In my opinion, cold is one of the best preservatives for this purpose. This form of preservation is better adapted to the handling of egg substance removed from the shell than to eggs in their natural condition. Whatever method be employed it seems desirable that proper methods of candling, grading, and handling be carried out. Such methods might conceivably be left to the honesty and efficiency of individual dealers or they might be under the supervision and advice of experts appointed by the Federal Government. It is my belief that the method of Federal inspection should be adopted. This is necessary in order to protect the public against improper practices such as the use of chemical preservatives, the admixture of spoiled eggs, and the danger, however slight, of possible infection during the processes of handling and preparation.

3. Such a method of centralized control would be especially to the point in the case of eggs as compared with some other food substances. There is at present no recognized scientific standard whereby the quality of an egg may be determined in the laboratory. A sweet and wholesome egg may contain many more bacteria than a rotten egg. Chemical products of decomposition may often be detected more simply and readily by the sense of taste or smell than by refined laboratory methods. From a scientific standpoint therefore, endeavors to control the quality of the egg supply by analyses of frozen, dried, or shell eggs are premature and may even be misleading. Centralized inspection, on the other hand, would be more accurate, precise, and effective.

4. I would further urge such inspection on grounds of economy. At present a large part of the egg supply of the country is wasted and rendered unavailable by the prevalence of antiquated and unintelligent methods. The growing need for a conservation of our food supplies seems to emphasize this point especially. A large amount of valuable food could be saved annually through the encouragement of suitable means of preservation, and by education of the farmer and dealer in proper and cleanly methods of handling this food. Cooperation on the part of the Federal Government would seem plainly indicated. I firmly believe that a close and friendly contact of the Government experts with practical dealers in egg products would result in the solving of many problems and would be of great benefit to the whole country.

Very respectfully, yours, EDWIN O. JORDAN,
Professor of Bacteriology, University of Chicago.

Mr. CARTER. I offer an amendment to come in on page 50, after the word "dollars," in line 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that his colleague has already secured the adoption of an amendment at that point, and the amendment which the Senator now offers should be to what will follow that, unless he wishes his amendment to precede that one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is to come in previous to that amendment. The Senator desires to have his amendment, as the Chair understands, before his colleague's amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to have the amendment inserted between the text of the bill and the amendment which was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars" at the end of line 2, on page 50, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended to pay salary or expenses of any person for the examination of protest or contest of any mining claim upon which there is not a growth of timber of commercial value.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. At the end of the bill I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Just before the last paragraph in the bill it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare, or cause to be prepared, a statement showing all expenditures made each fiscal year by, through, or on account of the Forest Service from the year 1900 to the year 1910, both inclusive, stated as follows:

"For permanent forest improvements in each State and Territory; for salaries and other compensation of inspectors, forest supervisors, forest rangers, deputy forest rangers, assistant forest rangers, stating the number of each class; for part-time force to meet emergencies in extinguishing forest fires; for railroad fares, automobile hire, carriage and horse hire; for hotel bills; for freight and express; for telephone and telegraph; for statutory and lump-fund salaries of officers and clerks and the number thereof in the city of Washington, and all other expenditures made for the conduct of the bureau in the city of Washington, including rent, fuel, stationery, furniture, furnishings, typewriters (giving number purchased), miscellaneous supplies (giving classification of same); for salaries, clerk hire, hotel bills, automobile, carriage, and horse hire, miscellaneous supplies (giving classification thereof), office supplies, and all other expenditures made in connection with the conduct of the Forest Service outside of the city of Washington; for compensation of persons engaged in writing descriptive or other matter for publication (giving names of persons so employed and amount paid to each therefor), and the names of publications accepting such matter for publication and amount paid to each therefor; for photographs, lantern slides, lecture equipment, and lecturers; for printing and binding; said statement to show also for the same period of time the amounts collected by the Forest Service for timber and the use of the forest."

Mr. WARREN. The committee does not propose to object to that amendment, although the greater portion of it is already covered by a former bill which carries the necessary legislation. I do not object to the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I observe that the concluding paragraph in the bill provides for the repeal of the statute heretofore passed providing for an examination. Hence I have offered the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN subsequently said: I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] to an amendment which he offered and to ask him if he will not be willing to change its position and let it repeal the matter from line 18 on page 79 to line 3 on page 80, inserting in lieu thereof what he has proposed.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the arrangement suggested by the Senator from Wyoming be made in the structure of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the change will be made.

Mr. PILES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. It should come in on page 47, line 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 47, in line 4, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out the words "one hundred and seventy-seven thousand and forty" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and eighty-seven thousand and forty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have been waiting during the reading to ascertain whether there was anything germane in the amendment or anything that should by right go into the bill. It seems to me it is general legislation of the very broadest type, and I will have to make the point of order against it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I object to the Senator from Wyoming undertaking to dispose of the character of the amendment or deciding how wide or how narrow it is until it has been read.

Mr. WARREN. I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let the amendment be read, so as to see whether you will want to make the point of order on it. You may change your mind when you hear it all.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment; which was to insert at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. —. That certain words used in this act and in proceedings pursuant hereto shall, unless the same be inconsistent with the context, be construed as follows: The word "message" shall mean any communication by telegraph, telephone, wireless telegraph, cable, or other means of communication from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or to any foreign country. The word "person" shall mean any person, partnership, joint stock company, society, association, or corporation, their managers and officers, and when used with reference to the commission of acts which are herein required or forbidden shall include persons who are participants in the required or forbidden acts, and the agents, officers, and members of the boards of directors and trustees, or other similar controlling or directing bodies of partnerships, joint stock companies, societies, associations, and corporations. And words importing the plural number, wherever used, may be applied to or mean only a single person or thing, and words importing the singular number may be applied to or mean several persons or things.

SEC. —. That it shall be unlawful for any person to send or cause to be sent any message offering to make or enter into a contract for the purchase or sale for future delivery of cotton without intending that such cotton shall be actually delivered or received, or offering to make or enter into a contract whereby any party thereto or any party for whom or in whose behalf such contract is made acquires the right or privilege to demand in the future the acceptance or delivery of cotton without being thereby obligated to accept or to deliver such cotton; and the transmission of any message relating to any such transaction is hereby declared to be an interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations. Any person who shall be guilty of violating this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not more than $1,000 nor less than $100 or shall be imprisoned for not more than six months nor less than one month, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and the sending or causing to be sent of each such message shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. —. That it shall be the duty of any person sending any message relating to a contract or to the making of a contract for future delivery of cotton to furnish to the person transmitting such message an affidavit stating that he is the owner of such cotton and that he has the intention to deliver such cotton; or that such cotton is at the time in actual course of growth on land owned, controlled, or cultivated by him, and that he has the intention to deliver such cotton; or that he is, at the time, legally entitled to the right of future possession of such cotton under and by authority of a contract for the sale and future delivery thereof previously made by the owner of such cotton, giving the name of the party or names of parties to such contract and the time when and the place where such contract was made and the price therein stipulated, and that he has the intention to deliver such cotton; or that he has the intention to acquire and deliver such cotton; or that he has the intention to receive and pay for such cotton: Provided, That any person electing to do so may file with the telegraph, telephone, wireless telegraph, or cable company an affidavit stating that the message or messages being sent, or to be sent, for the six months next ensuing by such person do not and will not relate to any such contract or offers to contract as are described in section 2 of this act, and any such company shall issue thereupon a certificate evidencing the fact that such affidavit has been duly filed and such certificate shall be accepted in lieu of the affidavit herein required at all the transmitting offices of such company during the life of said affidavit. Any person who knowingly shall make a false statement in any affidavit provided for in this act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 nor less than $500 or shall be imprisoned for not more than two years nor less than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment. And in any prosecution under the provisions of sections 2 or 3 of this act the proof of failure to make any affidavit herein required shall be prima facie evidence that said message or messages related to a contract prohibited by section 2 of this act, and the proof of failure to deliver or receive the cotton called for in any contract for future delivery of cotton shall be prima facie evidence that there was no intention to deliver or receive such cotton when said contract was made.

SEC. —. That it shall be unlawful for any person owning or operating any telegraph or telephone line, wireless telegraph, cable, or other means of communication, or any officer, agent, or employee of such person, knowingly to use such property or knowingly to allow such property to be used for the transmission of any message relating to such contracts as are described in section 2 of this act. Any person who shall be guilty of violating this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished for each offense by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $500, and the sending of each message in violation of the provisions of this section shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. —. That in any proceeding under this act all persons may be required to testify and to produce books and papers, and the claim that such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the persons giving such testimony or producing such evidence shall not excuse such person from testifying or producing such books and papers; but no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or punishment whatever for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence of any character whatever.

SEC. —. The foregoing sections shall take effect and be in force from and after January 1, 1912.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, there was, I think, no point of order made against the amendment after it had been presented to the Senate. For the first time the amendment is pending. I do not think that a premature point of order can have the effect of representing the present views of the Senator in charge of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is on agreeing to the amendment. The Senator from Wyoming, the Chair understood, made a point of order against it.

Mr. WARREN. I made a point of order.

Mr. HALE. Did the Chair rule on the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ruled the amendment out of order.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is not out of order in the absence of objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Wyoming to object.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That objection was withdrawn pending the reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection, the Chair understood, was withheld.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I can not draw the distinction.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there was no withdrawal of the point of order, but I again make the point of order against the amendment, that it is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The amendment evidently proposes general legislation.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it is evident that we can not complete the bill now, but can do so very soon after a recess. I move that the Senate take a recess.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senator to withhold that motion for a moment until I can give notice to the Senate that I hope to bring up the Post Office appropriation bill on the conclusion of the bill now pending.

Mr. HALE. That is the understanding. I move that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, allow me, before that is passed upon, to send to the desk two amendments which I desire to have considered before the bill passes from the Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 10456. An act to restrain the Secretary of the Treasury from receiving bonds issued to provide money for the building of the Panama Canal as security for the issue of circulating notes to national banks, and for other purposes; and

S. 10883. An act authorizing the Erie Railroad Co. to construct a canal connecting the Hackensack River and Berrys Creek, Bergen County, N. J., as an aid to navigation, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 28436) to further increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 10476. An act for the relief of Passed Asst. Paymaster Edwin M. Hacker;

S. 10808. An act to authorize the Greeley-Arizona Irrigation Co. to build a dam across the Colorado River at or near Head Gate Rock, near Parker, in Yuma County, Ariz.; and

S. 10882. An act to authorize the county of Ouachita, in the State of Arkansas, to construct a bridge across the Ouachita River.

RECESS.

Mr. HALE. I renew my motion that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

At the expiration of the recess, at 8 o'clock p. m., the Senate reassembled.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 31596) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The bill is in the Senate and open to amendments.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are two amendments pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair informs the Senator that two amendments can not be pending at the same time. Which amendment does the Senator desire to have acted upon first?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let them be acted upon in the order in which they come in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after "For," on page 32, line 24, down to the word "dollars," line 2, page 50, and insert:

For maintenance and protection of national forests, $1,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, just a remark. That brings the Forestry Service within $1,000,000, that is, so far as maintenance is concerned. I think this is a proper time to enter upon this reform. One million dollars for the maintenance of the forests ought to be quite sufficient, and if it requires more than that then there is something wrong with the system.

This amendment is not offered in any other than with the serious intention of trying to reform the service. I should like to have the Senate here to vote by yea and nay vote upon the question.

Mr. WARREN. May I call the attention of the Senator to his amendment? I wish to know where the words to be stricken out end.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, line 2.

Mr. WARREN. What I wanted to say to the Senator is, if he strikes that out he strikes out the total for the Forestry Service, five million five hundred and odd thousand dollars.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and I insert $1,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. He inserts that, but he leaves some $3,000,000 preceding which by law would be then payable, although the amount would not be appropriated for it.

Mr. HEYBURN. A little entanglement like that would, perhaps, improve this measure.

Mr. WARREN. I wanted the Senator to know what he would do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am starting in here with a reduction of only a little over $4,000,000. It may be that there will be other work with the pruning knife later; but this is a clear-cut item leaving a vicious principle in this service. If we start in upon our reformation at this point I care not what other reformation becomes necessary.

I do not like to have a call, but I wish Senators would come in in order to vote on this question.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Washington has called for a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has not recognized the Senator from Washington for that purpose. He asked if the Senator from Idaho would yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JONES. No; I addressed the Chair. I simply ask that a quorum be present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beveridge	Clark, Wyo.	Johnston	Richardson
Borah	Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Root
Bourne	Culberson	Kean	Shively
Bradley	Cummins	La Follette	Smoot
Bristow	Curtis	Lodge	Stone
Brown	Dick	McCumber	Sutherland
Bulkeley	Dillingham	Martin	Thornton
Burnham	Fletcher	Nelson	Warner
Burrows	Foster	Overman	Warren
Burton	Gallinger	Page	Wetmore
Carter	Gamble	Paynter	Young
Chamberlain	Hale	Perkins
Clapp	Heyburn	Piles

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think I ought to ask for the reading of the second amendment. There are two amendments. I will ask the Senator from Idaho whether one depends in any way upon the other.

Mr. HEYBURN. One of them might very properly follow the other. I have not a copy. I will get a copy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has not yet been read.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, since the Senator is present I will restate in a word the purpose of this amendment. It proposes to strike out this long enumeration of local subdivisions of the Forest Service with its officers, commencing on page 32, line 24, down to the end of that subject, and it will then read:

For maintenance and protection of the national forests, $1,000,000.

That will enable them to adjust themselves to a million-dollar business. It cuts the appropriation for the item down a little over $4,000,000. That is a sum of money worth considering. The matter has not been discussed at length, but I am going to give Senators who do believe in this retrenchment an opportunity to vote on it. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho, upon which he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the proposition, to ascertain whether I understand it aright. The "Forest Service" in the bill commences on page 26 and extends to page 50, carrying with it definite positions and salaries for different officers and employees, and ends with an appropriation of $2,318,680. Following on under "General expenses" to page 50, the total, which includes the one I have just mentioned, and for general expenses, is $5,523,100.

The amendment does not include the first pages and therefore while the five million five hundred and odd thousand dollars would be reduced to $1,000,000 there would still be in the law appropriations between two and three million dollars, definitely stating where it should go, but with merely the total stricken out, so that the law would provide for the employment just the same, and the payment would have come in later as a deficiency.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, of course the totals can be arranged. There will be no difficulty about that. The totals should be made to conform with the appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to call the Senator's attention——

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me first answer this. As to the number of men employed, that is cut out by the amendment. The Forestry Service would then employ only so many men as could be employed within the appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the amendment is rather inconsistent in this way, that it takes out all of the Forest Service local employees of the States with the exception of the number $1,000,000 would employ.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it simply disenumerates them, if I may use such a word, and leaves the employment to be governed by the amount of money to be expended. I propose to take out the enumeration.

Mr. SMOOT. I was about to say if we are going to employ only men to the amount of $1,000,000, then the first part of the Forest Service would be altogether more than is necessary.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would be out of proportion.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be out of proportion not only because they could not use so many men here, but their work depends largely upon the number who are available for the field.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a very proper suggestion, and one that I have given attention to and marked, but it is a proper subject for another amendment. In other words, I do not want to make an amendment that covers a part of two subjects matter. But first let us deal with this, which is complete within itself. It is an enumeration of the employees, and it provides for an appropriation of something over $5,000,000.

I leave the provision for the performance of the necessary work to be done by a proper number of men within the appropriation of $1,000,000, giving them a million dollars instead of $5,000,000. The only result will be that they will have to cut their work, or the number of men, down to suit their appropriations.

The other question of the preceding section—that is, the executive departments here in Washington and elsewhere—is not at all disturbed by the amendment. I do not want to amend two parts of the bill in one amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. If this amendment passes without changing the other provision, it will be so out of proportion that it will virtually destroy the Forest Service, and if that is the object——

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. SMOOT. We might as well destroy it at once and have done with the whole thing.

Mr. HEYBURN. A million dollars for field work can not be said to destroy any enterprise. It is a considerable sum of money. We were promised that $50,000 would be sufficient, and then we were promised that one hundred thousand, two hundred thousand, and so on, would be sufficient.

Now, let us go back to first principles and reduce the number of employees to a number commensurate with the appropriation. We have got to commence somewhere, or we have got to allow this thing to grow, and it will rival the Army and Navy bills in a few years if we do not stop it. It was the statement of the Chief Forester, a year or two ago in a public address, that this would require something like 160,000 men. One hundred and sixty thousand is a pretty large body of men, and the expense at an average of $1,000 a year, which is not far from the average, would be a very large item, and we would be dealing here as we do with items that go to the protection of the Government. I would be willing to cooperate with the Senator from Utah to adjust the preceding paragraphs to this, but let us vote upon this and adopt it and then fit the bill to it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am forced to say that the amendment will not do what its mover evidently thinks it will, because it leaves intact here the language of the bill, which provides for the improvement of the national forests and states how much shall be expended for them. It leaves the statement that there shall be one forester at $5,000, or, rather, a chief of division, so many officials at so many dollars per annum salary, and so forth, and the two lines which he proposes to strike out would simply strike out the assembled total. Putting a million dollars in its place would be, of course, contrary to the footing that preceded it; and, under the order of the Senate, the grand totals are to be completed by the clerks at the desk. So I shall have to ask that the amendment be voted down, although I desire economy, as does everyone else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Beginning on page 32 with line 24, it is proposed to strike out all down to and including line 2, on page 50, and to insert in lieu thereof the following words:

For maintenance and protection of the national forests, $1,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, if this amendment should be adopted, how much of an appropriation would be left to the Forestry Department for the conduct of its business for the next year?

Mr. HEYBURN. One million dollars.

Mr. BORAH. Am I to understand that $1,000,000 is proposed to be appropriated to this particular work?

Mr. HEYBURN. No. I propose to follow this amendment with an additional amendment to strike out from line 23, on page 26, down to the place where the amendment under consideration commences.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the chairman——

Mr. HEYBURN. That will give them a million dollars for the maintenance and protection of the national forest reserves, without any details whatever. They will have a million dollars, and they will have to get along the best they can with that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why did the Senator not make it one amendment?

Mr. HEYBURN. I might have made it one amendment. I might, perhaps, get at it more quickly by modifying the amendment. I will modify the amendment by moving to strike out all after line 23, on page 26, down to and including the provision on page 50.

Mr. GALLINGER. That makes it clear.

Mr. HEYBURN. That gives them a round sum of money. Let them cut their coat to fit the cloth and organize themselves, knowing that they are not allowed to spend over $1,000,000. That is a good bit of money to spend on the Forestry Service.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean, then, to begin the amendment on page 26, after line 23, and to strike out all of the text, with the exception of the appropriation of $1,000,000?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. It will then provide——

Mr. SMOOT. Then it provides for the Forest Service $1,000,000?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would probably consider it if the Senator would suggest that amendment, but I intended that it should provide for the maintenance and protection of the national forests, and I prefer those words.

Mr. SMOOT. I was not suggesting the words that should be used; I was only suggesting my understanding of the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay this bill; but while I am very much in favor of reducing the amount of the appropriation, there seems to be an involved understanding as to what we are doing. I should like to see the amount reduced very materially, and yet I think it would be unwise to reduce it to such an extent that it would leave the Government without the power to take care of that which it must necessarily take care of now, as it has done in the Forest Service. We do not understand here what the effect of this amendment is going to be.

Mr. SMOOT. It would destroy the Forest Service.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Utah says it means the destruction of the Forest Service.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think if the amendment is carried, that the Forest Service will be so crippled that $1,000,000 will not do it any good at all. We collect to-day from the sale of timber within the forest reserves more than $1,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, it was not intended, nor do we now contemplate, that the Government shall go into the lumber business. I realize that this is a radical proposition and I realize that this is a radical step, and you have got to deal with it in that way. The $1,000,000 to be used by the Agricultural Department can protect and maintain the forests of the United States so far as it is necessary to do so.

I hope to see at an early day these lands no longer in a forest. I will read as a part of my suggestion the amendment which I shall propose to follow the pending one:

Provided, That all lands upon which there is growing less than 4,000 feet of merchantable timber, board measure, shall be excluded from the forest reserves, and no part of any appropriation herein made shall be expended upon any lands thus precluded.

That will eliminate fully one-half of the lands from the existing forest reserves. That is an admitted fact; nobody will controvert that who knows the figures and knows the lands. With this amendment bringing the appropriation down to a million dollars, to be expended for the maintenance and protection—that is all; those two words embody it all—of the national forests, and providing for the elimination from the national forests of untimbered lands, or lands with less than 4,000 feet of lumber upon them, you will have a forest-reserve law that will eventually result in the lands being thrown open to settlement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was not in the Senate when the pending amendment was proposed. As I understand it, the Senator from Idaho proposes to strike out of this bill all of the language beginning with line 24, on page 26, down to and including line 6, on page 31.

Mr. HEYBURN. On page 50.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Idaho proposes to go further than that and to strike out the text of the bill down to and including the first two lines on page 50; in other words, to cover——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And to insert the general language which he has stated?

Mr. WARREN. In other words, to strike out the entire forestry work of the bill and to insert therein the language "one million dollars" in place of "five million five hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, if the Senator will permit me, what he proposes to do is to make an appropriation of $1,000,000 instead of $5,000,000, without any investigation as to details, as to what may be needed by the Forest Service; and, in addition to that, the Senator proposes to make a lump appropriation one $1,000,000, to be expended by the Forester as he pleases, without any limitation whatever.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the Senator from Utah has not heard all of this. The section will read when it is amended:

For maintenance and protection of the national forests, $1,000,000.

That is to maintain and protect them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I know; but the Senator proposes to turn the million dollars over to a bureau chief, to be expended in his discretion.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have been doing that in every appropriation bill since we have had a Forest Service.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no.

Mr. HEYBURN. An amendment adopted four years ago gave the Forest Service a million dollars, I think, to expend, without any limitation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This bill enumerates the various officials who shall be paid and fixes their salaries. Now, the Senator proposes to turn over the vast sum of a million dollars to the forester to pay to whomsoever he pleases, without any limitation upon him at all. It seems to me a most remarkable proposition.

Mr. HEYBURN. The reduction I propose is a limitation of some consequence. It will save the Government several million dollars and still leave an effective provision for the maintenance and protection of the forests.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. This amendment is proposed by the Senator from Idaho as an open, frank, and avowed enemy of the forest policy of the United States. With the frankness that always characterizes him he says that he is an enemy of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I did not use the term "enemy."

Mr. ROOT. I shall not make a speech, but shall state my protest against the abandonment of a settled policy by a vote of the Senate of the United States upon the proposal of a single enemy of that policy, without consideration, without the report of a committee, and without grave and substantial reasons convincing the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, much of the demand of the Senator has already been supplied in his absence. The question was under consideration for about an hour before the recess was ordered.

Mr. ROOT. Upon the report of what committee, Mr. President, is this change to be made?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, we do not act upon amendments to appropriation bills upon the report of a committee where the amendment is to strike out or reduce. I know of no such procedure in this body.

Mr. ROOT. I observe that this amendment has no such basis.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there is not the slightest reason why an amendment of this kind should be submitted to or reported from a committee. It is an amendment proposed within the rules of procedure of this body, at a proper time and in a proper manner, to amend an appropriation bill by reducing the appropriation proposed in the bill; and it is not open to any objection under any rule of this body.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to ask my colleague if he would not be willing——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I will ask the Senator if he would not be willing to change his amendment so as to leave a larger sum—say, $2,000,000 or $2,500,000—for the Forestry Bureau? I am very anxious to see the amount reduced, because I have no doubt my colleague is entirely correct as to the extravagance in some of these matters, and it should be reduced; but I am not willing to leave the Government in a crippled condition to do what it ought to do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, one of the purposes that I had in mind in proposing the amendment was to reduce the expenses of this bureau. The fact that I suggested $1,000,000 is not conclusive of the fact that I would insist upon that exact amount, but $1,000,000 is more than the department ever claimed up to two years ago that it would require for the Forestry Service, and I was practically taking them at their word.

If my colleague thinks a larger sum should be expended, and will propose an amendment without affecting the integrity of the amendment I have offered, I will not be illiberal or obstinate about it. I want some definite time fixed when this policy is to stop. Let us quit dealing in politics of government and deal in the law of the land. I care not whose policy it is; it is not the law; it does not appeal to me. Of course, this is the only part of the Government where policy or a reference to a policy is appropriate, because we take up policies here and crystallize them into statutes. I care nothing at all about the policy of anybody outside of the membership of Congress. It does not appeal to me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am in sympathy, Mr. President, with the desire of the Senator from Idaho to reduce this appropriation. I believe we have drifted into an unwise and extravagant policy in regard to forest reserves, but I am troubled about the Senator's amendment in one respect, and desire to call his attention to that. The first portion of the section which the Senator proposes to strike out deals with the organization of the Forest Service. It provides for a Forester and states his salary, for forest supervisors, and so on. If the Senator's amendment is adopted, that goes out of the bill, the entire Forest Service will be necessarily disorganized, and the money be left in the hands, I suppose, of the Secretary of Agriculture to expend. I think that probably would not be a desirable change to make—to utterly disorganize a service so far as its present organization is concerned, and put this money in the hands of the Secretary. I think, if the amendment could be in some way reconstructed so as to leave the same organization as at present, that would be better than to strike it entirely out. I may be wrong about it; but that is the way it impresses me just now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that did I not think that the existing machinery of the Government in the Agricultural Department was sufficient and competent to deal with it, I would not have offered the amendment in this form.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely want to state to the Senator from Idaho that as one member of the Committee on Agriculture, from which this bill comes, I was in some doubt as to a great many of these items, but the rule seems to have been to rely largely on the heads of the departments. For instance, the Secretary of Agriculture is in the confidence of all, and it was felt that he would not make a recommendation that was not clearly within the scope of what he considered to be for the best interests of each bureau under his department. I acknowledge that I was totally ignorant of what was essential for the various forest reserves. They are in a section of country which made it inconvenient for me to see and to study them and I felt my inability to judge as to their needs. As I mentioned to a member of the committee, I did not feel that I ought to assume the responsibility of making a report when I did not know the minute details and the needs of that upon which I was assuming the responsibility of reporting.

But I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill, coming from the House, was printed and at his service and the service of other Senators. The committee had a stated day for meeting, and it seems to me that, in fairness to the committee and in fairness to the American people, the thing for the Senator to have done was to have come to the committee, to have laid the facts before us, and then let us assume the responsibility, either pro or con, with the facts as the Senator has given them to the Senate. Then we could have defended any action that might have been taken in accordance with the facts as submitted by the Senator from Idaho, in whose integrity I have implicit confidence.

Mr. HEYBURN. The suggestion that the matter should have been presented to the Committee on Agriculture is in one sense entirely correct, but the Senator should bear in mind that this is the Committee on Agriculture now in session. We are sitting here as the greater Committee on Agriculture, with the rights to amend any bill that comes before us to the extent or within the limits of the practice and procedure of this body.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, if that be true, it is true in the larger sense, and we had as well dispense with all of our committees in reference to the Senate, because those of us who have passed upon this bill do not feel like it is exactly fair to us to meet in all good faith and digest a bill when Members who think that they could correct it refuse to meet with us. I think these committees were appointed for the expedition of business, and we are not certainly meeting with closed doors.

I will admit to the Senator from Idaho that some facts he has brought out this afternoon I knew nothing about. I was not in a position to know them. I suppose I should have held the bill up, according to his contention, until such time as I knew these facts, or not being given a satisfactory answer, refused to acquiesce in it until I did get a satisfactory answer.

But I went upon the presumption that the chairman of the committee and Senators who came from that section, plus the Secretary of Agriculture, would not recommend a thing which was to the detriment of the American people. Possibly I am getting wiser. I hope the Senator from Idaho will help me to get wiser.

Mr. HEYBURN. The recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture is simply a suggestion. The Secretary of Agriculture has no function involving the suggestion of legislation, and it is purely a matter of convenience. He is the convenient vehicle, rather, through whom the committee gathers information. That is all. His recommendation carries no weight whatever with it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator from Idaho will permit me to suggest that as the Secretary of Agriculture is charged with these subdivisions——

Mr. HEYBURN. No; he has charge of nothing. He has charge of carrying out the expressed will of Congress; no other. They have grown to think that they have policies that they are in charge of, but he is purely an executive officer, and he violated, or some one under him violated, the law, the written law of this land, to the extent of $900,000 or thereabouts by expending money in advance of appropriations——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That may be true.

Mr. HEYBURN. Which he had no right to do, and we put it in the urgent deficiency bill to allow them to recoup the fund.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That may be true.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest to the Senator not to give too much weight to the recommendations of officials in regard to appropriation bills. They are more often warnings than they are of assistance. The departments are more or less ambitious to spend large sums of money, and I say it with all due regard to the personnel.

I hold them in as high regard as any other member of this body, but I have learned something in regard to it in the years that have gone by as to the estimates and the desire to have money to spend.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Idaho will allow just one word, I would hate to arrive at that state of mind with reference to the heads of our departments where their recommendation would come to me as a member of the committee as being a warning for me to go in the other direction. Then I should certainly vote, and I think I would introduce a bill to the effect that——

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator states it more strongly than I stated it, or intended to state it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I was inferring——

Mr. HEYBURN. I said they were more often a warning to be on guard against excessive appropriations.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In a word I just meant to say this. It seemed to me that the head of the department, with all of its subdivisions, charged with the discharge of a duty which we have delegated to them or which under our law rightly belongs to them, would of necessity be more familiar with all the detailed workings and the needs of it than any member of the committee might be. I mean the personnel, the aggregate of the committee.

There may be some on the committee who are more familiar than he, but with his advice, plus the advice of others who knew, it seems to me that he would, in general terms, know more about what was necessary for the proper discharge of the functions of his office than any other member, providing he was an honest man, efficient and hoping to serve the people in his capacity.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that I think it is only four years ago since the Secretary of Agriculture was introduced to the forestry subject. We only transferred it to that department four years ago, and it is of not such ancient authority or experience as to make his opinion of very great value.

The responsibility is upon the Senate, and there are members of the committee now dealing with this who have had that subject under consideration for as long as or twice as long as——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator from Idaho will please understand me. I am not defending this expenditure. I am simply stating why I, as a member of the committee, acquiesced in it. I want the Senator to understand that, if he can show where it is an extravagance, I will vote for his resolution as quick as though I were on the committee, because I did not have sufficient facts to vote intelligently while in committee.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FLINT. May I ask the Senator what is his proposition?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will state what the bill will be after this is stricken out. We propose to strike out a number of pages. This part of the bill will read, when amended: "For maintenance and protection of national forests, $1,000,000." There are rules and regulations in existence that provide for all of the details of the management of the forests. Those rules can be changed by the department in charge of them, and he can immediately adapt those rules to the sum of money he has to spend.

Mr. FLINT. Let me call attention to the fact that this amount of money that the Senator has asked to be stricken out, or to have the amount reduced, is to be expended for trails, for fire brakes. I trust that the Senator——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is in the judgment of the department; whatever is included within the meaning of the words "maintenance" and "protection." Those words are very comprehensive. It leaves it to the department to maintain and protect the forests. That is all that should be left to the department, and it gives it a million dollars, if we agree upon that sum. I am perfectly free to say that if Senators think that sum should be increased some, I would not protest.

Mr. FLINT. I take it the Senator is not in favor of making the appropriation so low that we could not have sufficient trails and firebreaks.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am proposing to make it three or four times the amount that they said to us, well within the memory of the Senator from California and myself, would be sufficient. I am proposing to make it more than double the sum they told us—I think it was four years ago—would be sufficient.

Now, at that time there was practically the same amount of land in forest reserves that there is now—not a very great difference. I am also coupling with this an amendment providing for the elimination of nontimbered land. That will take at least one-third, according to the official report in our State. It takes more than one-third of them out of the forest reserves, and provides that no part of the money shall be expended in connection with the lands that are to be eliminated from the forest reserves. I am starting—I will say to the Senator from California—I am trying to start in the right direction. First stay the hand and then look over the field between now and the next Congress and let us see what the expenditure of a million dollars will do. It may be that upon a proper reorganization of the working forces of the Forest Service a million dollars will be sufficient. They told us it would be more than sufficient so recently that I am inclined to give some credit to them for having tried to make a truthful statement and an intelligent statement. They told us not only that it would be sufficient, but at that time, or at least within the next two years, it would be self-supporting and it would be contributing to the National Treasury instead of withdrawing from it. Let us try. We know the present condition is intolerable; but let us try.

Mr. FLINT. Assuming that the forester, or whoever had charge of the Forest Service, made a mistake, certainly we should not now stop the trails and firebreaks when we know the disasters that have taken place during the last few years.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know, of course, upon what the Senator from California bases his statement with reference to trails and roads.

Mr. FLINT. Firebreaks.

Mr. HEYBURN. The trails that were builded up in the forests in the northwestern country afforded no assistance whatever to the fire fighters. The men were found burned and lying dead in the trails.

Mr. FLINT. I want to say to the Senator from Idaho, as far as my part of the State is concerned, they are not likely to reach places where they are likely to have fires, because they do not have trails. Instead of this appropriation being decreased, it ought to be increased, as far as concerns the building of trails and firebreaks. It would be a great misfortune, even though the Senator's view may be carried out of reducing this expenditure, to take and provide that this part of the forest-reserves system shall be reduced, so far as the appropriations are concerned.

Mr. HEYBURN. If it is so important, and the Secretary is convinced of that, he probably will spend a large proportion of this million dollars for that purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I understand the Senator from Idaho, he proposes to reduce the total appropriation for the Forest Service from $5,500,000, as proposed by the bill, to a round sum of $1,000,000.

It appears on page 31 of the bill that it now takes $2,318,680 to pay for the salaries of the various officers in the department and the rangers in the field in this service. If I understand it correctly, the Senator would limit the total appropriation for use in the field and in the offices of the Forest Service to $1,000,000, which would be less than one-half of what is spent at present for the salaries of officers employed in the service, and would leave nothing whatever for actual service in the forests.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I can show the Senator wherein he misunderstands the amendment. The amendment was amended so as to commence on page 26.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We can not hear the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am simply stating that the amendment was amended so as to commence on page 26. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] was referring to the amendment as it was first proposed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I understand, the amendment as first proposed was the pending amendment coupled with a notice by the Senator that if that was adopted he then would move to strike out all from the bottom of page 26 to line 6 on page 31.

Mr. HEYBURN. Upon the suggestion of Senators, I consolidated and made one amendment of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That I did not know. Let the amendment be reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

The SECRETARY. On page 26, after the heading "Forest Service," strike out all of the bill down to and including line 2 on page 50, and insert:

For maintenance and protection of the national forests, $1,000,000.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is substantially as I understood it. It reduces the amount appropriated for salaries for all officials and employees of the bureau, estimated to be over $2,000,000, to $1,000,000, and leaves nothing for service in the forests.

Mr. HEYBURN. It might be a good thing if we would eliminate some of the office appropriation—the officers who live in Washington. The place to protect those forests is in the forests. No man can protect a forest in Montana or Oregon by remaining in Washington. There is nothing that he can do in Washington that will extinguish a fire in Montana.

It is suggested to me that it might be done by wireless telegraph. That is about as practicable as some of the schemes that have been indulged in.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Idaho has referred to the impression which was left upon us several years ago that this branch of the service would be self-sustaining. I remember very well when that suggestion was made and how deeply impressed we all were with the fact that the down and fallen timber upon these reserves would soon afford a fine income to the Government over and above the expenses of operation.

I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho whether he has any figures to show the income of the Government from these forest reserve lands?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Michigan has given one of the nicest demonstrations of the reasoning in regard to this matter and its practical effect that I could possibly want. It was promised that the sale of the dead and down timber would result in a revenue to the Government toward the payment of the expenses of the Forest Service.

Where the dead and down timber in the forests can be found, there is no market for it, because it being in a forest reserve there is nobody around to buy it, and it is not worth hauling out.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And it has not been marketed?

Mr. HEYBURN. It has not been marketed to any extent when you compare it with the existing conditions—none whatever. The dead and down timber in the forest reserves has no market value, because there is no market for it.

Take a forest reserve like the forest reserve in Idaho, the first one created there. It is about as large as the State of Connecticut. Everybody is excluded from it. One of the first acts that I did was to get the little town of Elk City eliminated, with a township or two. All outside of that it is a howling wilderness, and the howls do not come from men but from beasts. Where are you going to find market in a country like that for anything—for lumber or vegetables or energy or anything that a man has to sell?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was somewhat impressed by the statement made by the Senator from Idaho this afternoon that the wardens, I believe they are called, had an exclusive monopoly of the hunting privileges in the forest reserves, and that they were enabled to draw large sums of money for killing undesirable animals infesting those forests. If that is true, and they do draw extra compensation from that source, I do not think there should be any great apprehension about the ability of the department to secure the services of young rangers for the service that is required.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no difficulty about securing the services of sufficient people for this work. They are glad to get the job of idleness.

I do not desire to continue the discussion of this question. I desire to start the wedge that shall ultimately split this vicious system.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Noticing the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], with whom I have a pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I will inquire whether the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. BACON. I withdraw my vote, as I have a general pair with that Senator.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 50, as follows:

So Mr. HEYBURN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HEYBURN. I send the following amendment to the desk to be inserted on page 49, at the end of the page.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 49, after the words "Forest Service," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That all land upon which there is growing less than 4,000 feet of merchantable timber, board measure, per acre, shall be excluded from all forest reserves, and no part of any appropriation herein made shall be expended upon any area thus excluded.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that amendment should be amended so as to define that these lands should be lying outside of the general body of the timber. That is the limit fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture. After the Secretary of Agriculture had visited the forest lands of the United States he was accredited with a statement, purporting to be official, that in his judgment, unless the land had growing upon it 4,000 feet or upward of timber per acre, it should not be classed as forest lands. I have said "board measure." That is merely to designate it with certainty.

This amendment proposes to eliminate those lands from the forests of the United States. They would then, of course, pass under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior and might be taken up as other public lands.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator give us a little explanation? I conceive that 1 acre might not have 4,000 board feet, and that 159 acres might have that much. The Senator does not designate in his amendment what body this is to cover, but simply, the way the amendment reads, if there is an acre that has not 4,000 feet of board measure in lumber that acre should be excluded, even though that acre might be far up in the mountains and would be required possibly for the purpose of growing timber to protect the water, and so forth. I think there is a great deal in the Senator's proposition, but it ought to be couched in such language that there can be no misconstruction of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator failed to take into account the suggestion I made when I had it read. I suggested, after hearing it read, that there should be a designation of the area to be taken into consideration, and I would amend the amendment by providing that at least the size of a homestead, 160 acres of land, should not be in the forest reserve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have corrected it, and I call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho will send it to the desk.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can perhaps explain it quite as well here.

Provided, That all land upon which there is growing less than 4,000 feet of merchantable timber board measure per acre, in contiguous areas of 160 acres, shall be excluded, etc.

That is a whole farm.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. I want the Senator to bear in mind this. He certainly does not want to make a joke out of this appropriation bill so far as the forest reserves are concerned. Under the orders of the Secretary of Agriculture now any agricultural land that contains less than 4,000 feet per acre will be eliminated on application. Three-fourths of the forest reserves are not even surveyed. If you attempted to eliminate every 160-acre plot from the Canadian border to the Mexican boundary line, including the top of bald mountains and rock slides on the hills, it would cost $20,000,000 for the Forest Service to make the inspection and surveys and to report and to do what this amendment would call for, which the order of the Secretary now eliminates when there are less than 4,000 feet of timber per acre on agricultural land by merely making an application to him.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. DIXON. It would make a million holes in the forest reserves in a million places.

Mr. HEYBURN. This is just that kind of red tape and machinery at the expense of the Government that I desire to do away with. Of course if you would carry out the system that is now in operation it would cost perhaps more than that, because these men insist on escorting you from your farm through an intervening forest reserve or making you go 100 miles around. They have all sorts of tantalizing and interfering processes. There is no reason on earth why if there are 160 acres of farm land or land upon which a man is willing to make his home within a forest reserve he should not be entitled and encouraged to use it.

The proposition that you may do it now is a myth. You can not do anything of the kind. I can show a stack of letters, and so can every other Senator from the Western States who is supposed to be in sympathy with the settler, appealing against the interference of the forester, who makes it absolutely and practically impossible to take advantage of a provision that never was intended to be made available to the settler. The first thing they do, if the settler has a case that they can not answer in any other way, is to declare that the land is necessary for administrative purposes. That is the first thing they do. Then if they can not make that stick longer there is sufficient time to hunt up some other reason. They will prove that he was off his land overnight, or that he went to town to get groceries and violated what they call their rules and regulations.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. FLINT. I realize what the Senator from Idaho is trying to accomplish by this amendment, but I want to point out to him the great injustice it would cause if it should be adopted.

Mr. HEYBURN. To whom?

Mr. FLINT. If the Senator will permit me, to the people in the southern part of my State and I think in some parts of his State, where the land has not been reserved for the purpose of its timber, but for the water supply, if we permit this land to be taken up. The mountains can not be cultivated. There is chaparral on them and small growth that would not be used for timber, and it would not have the amount of timber the Senator indicates in his amendment. Yet that land would be thrown open to settlement.

Mr. HEYBURN. Are not settlers worth more than the chaparral on the mountain?

Mr. FLINT. No; I say to the Senator, it is not possible to cultivate the land.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then settlers probably would not go there if it is not profitable to cultivate the land.

Mr. FLINT. I am not so certain of that. They would go there and attempt to make a homestead on the land and destroy it for a watershed.

Mr. HEYBURN. That illustrates the evil of this whole system. Instead of allowing a man to select a homestead for himself—and each man has a different standard according to his own qualifications—they insist on selecting it for him. By virtue of what principle, written or unwritten, in the laws of this country is one man entitled to constitute himself a guardian of another to determine whether his judgment is sufficient to enable him to carve out a living?

Mr. FLINT. No; but a whole community should be looked after rather than the individual. Where we have a community it would be absolutely on the mountain streams with the chaparral there holding back the winter waters. Would the Senator permit that to be taken up and destroy that watershed and destroy the entire community? It seems to me it would be a great mistake. I do not think the Senator wants to accomplish that at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I can hardly think that the Senator from California has given serious thought to that proposition. Here is land that he suggests is of sufficient value to induce settlement, and because, forsooth, some other settler might be inconvenienced by it, you would leave half the land idle. I do not think upon further thought the Senator from California would enunciate a doctrine of that kind. Some people prefer to live in the hills, some prefer to live in the valleys, some prefer to live in the open plains, and some prefer to live in the mountains.

Mr. FLINT. If the Senator will permit me, the valleys are where the great crops are produced.

Mr. HEYBURN. Whose crops? It is not the crop of the man who wants land on the top of the mountain; and his rights are equal. Let us share the benefits of climate and soil and conditions among all classes of people. The idea that the men in the valley shall say that great areas of land valuable for cultivation shall lie idle because it would inconvenience them! There is no principle of this Government that recognizes such a thing as that.

Mr. FLINT. It is not to inconvenience them, but to absolutely destroy them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, let us see. Of course there is not a thing on earth in the proposition that the snow lies longer in the timber than it does in the plains; it is quite the contrary. I went West two or three years ago with some of these enthusiastic people from the northeast corner of the United States. We were traveling along on the railroad, on the Oregon Short Line, up through the moutnains, and those hills and mountains there afforded one of the nicest examples and demonstrations of that question in the world. There were the bald mountains, with the snow on them, and the timbered mountains without any snow; the dandelions were growing under the trees; the snow had disappeared there first, because it falls lighter and the drippings from the trees tend to crystallize the snow. All at once it goes; you do not know just when it goes, but that solid, frozen snow will lie on those mountains until July and August. I have walked over it in July and August when it was 30 feet deep under my feet, and it was hard and frozen. It would remain there until the fall rains, which were the first things that had any influence on it. Those were the conditions; and I have known them in all of the Rocky Mountain States. You have only to look at it, and the fact there is worth more in determining this question than the theory of how nature ought to do things. There is nothing in the statement that timber holds snow back. It does not.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FLINT. I simply want to say to the Senator that I did not mention snow. I am not at all out of harmony with the argument the Senator makes in reference to snow and water falls.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I understand that the amendment will be accepted.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, rather than extend this colloquy any further, I am willing the amendment shall go into the bill. It will then go to conference, and we will view it there and see if we can save it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have great confidence, when the Senator from Wyoming tells me that he will attempt to save the amendment in conference, that he will do so.

It is not a waste of time. We have wasted the time of the Senate on matters which are absolutely unimportant as compared with this. I am speaking for a large portion of a great country, and I am speaking in earnestness and seriousness and from experience. I know something about it. I have not much patience with the declarations of those who have never seen a mountain or known the snow to lie upon it. They talk about its effect upon streams. I am not going to waste the time of the Senate. I never felt that I was more justified in any act that I have performed in my life than when I have stood here to protect that great country against the ravages and the impositions of a lot of theorists, who only go there when they come to disport themselves and to kill the animals. It is the man who lives there year after year, it is the man who wants to go there and live, that I care for. You are going to make those men so poor along the Canadian border and through this eastern country that you had better begin to get some land ready for them, because they will have to go somewhere—migrate to Canada or take to the ocean.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I voted yea on the first amendment of the Senator from Idaho, not with any view that the amendment would carry or with any great desire that it should carry, for I thought the Senator from Idaho realized as much as I did that in the hurry incident to the close of the session it was almost impossible to frame a just amendment to meet the conditions as they are presented in this bill to-day. But I voted yea on that amendment as a protest—a solemn protest—against a policy that has worked as has the forestry policy. I want here and now to make my meaning perfectly clear when I say I protest now against the idea that the lands and that the resources of our new States are the common property of the whole people in the sense that is urged on this floor. The waters in our streams, the gold in our hills, and the coal in our deserts are the common property of the people of the United States, but they are only the property of the people of the United States when the people come there to make use of them.

This Government of ours, Mr. President, has never been intended as a commercial or a mercantile or a money-making proposition. The true function of a government is to govern, and not to buy and sell. The true function of a nation is to make use of what God has given it. The true function of the nation is to raise up citizens for that nation and, as much as it can, contribute to their happiness, their comfort, and their prosperity.

My vote upon this amendment was cast as a protest against a policy that would harness the streams of the West for revenue to the Government; as a protest against a policy that would harvest the timbers of the West to go into the coffers of the Government; as a protest against a policy that would lock up the coal and the fuel supply of this country when it is needed. We know how badly it is needed for use upon our hearths and to turn our wheels. Guard as much as you can the use of this property, of these resources, but let them be used.

Mr. President, if this policy had been in force 100 years ago, not one-third of the area of New England would ever have passed into private ownership. Every horsepower in your beautiful streams that gives you wealth and riches and happy homes would have been taxed—the water would have passed over taxed wheels. Do Senators know that water power practically is impossible in the Rocky Mountains to-day? Do Senators know that the policy of the Government to-day is to impose a tax upon every horsepower that passes in water down our mountain sides? Do Senators realize that some of us who are opposing that policy feel as though the iron hand of the Republic was laid upon the throat of our sovereign States?

It has come to be thought a joke when anybody rises and opposes this policy. I say to the Senator from New York it is because we are so vitally interested that we bring this subject up from time to time; it is not because we would lay hands upon things that are sacred in the Republic; but it is because, if we can, we want to maintain what we have got and grow into something in the future; it is because we do not want to live in that country as tenants of this Government; it is because we want the opportunity to use the resources within the borders of our State; and I serve notice here and now that the next agricultural bill that comes before the Senate has got to show some reason for this tremendous expenditure of money.

Four years ago we wrote into the law on an agricultural appropriation bill a direction to those in authority to give the items of the estimates for this tremendous expense, to classify them, and when the expense was made, we directed them to make reports to Congress. We all remember that up to that time Congress had never asked for such an estimate.

Congress had never demanded a report of how the money had been spent; and the service lifted up its hands in horror when Congress assumed to direct that it should give some account of its stewardship, and it gave but a lame and incomplete account of it.

To show, Mr. President, the spirit that still animates that service, the desire to rise superior to and above the law, the desire to throw off all restraint of Congress upon this bureau, we are asked in this very bill—it was written into the bill as it passed the other House—to repeal the law which we passed requiring an estimate to be made of the appropriations, and requiring a report to be made of expenditures.

Mr. HALE. Is that in this bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is in this bill, Mr. President. It is not in the bill now as it appears in the Senate, because we have amended it as it came to the Senate, but I want to read to the Senator from Maine exactly what the bill called for as coming from the House. I do this simply to show, as I have said, how the desire is to create a great bureau in this Nation that shall control a great commercial enterprise; that shall handle, if you please, the entire destinies of a strip of land in forest reserves 200 miles wide that would extend two-thirds of the way across this continent.

I am afraid that we do not more than half appreciate the situation; I am afraid we do not more than half appreciate that if the forest reserves in the Rocky Mountains were put upon the Atlantic seacoast there would be no Senators here from New England; there would be no Senators in this Chamber from the Imperial State of New York; there would be no Senators here from Pennsylvania or Ohio; and more than that area is taken away from the use of the people in the Rocky Mountain country. We do not appreciate the scope of this matter.

I will say to the Senator from Maine that here is the paragraph to which I refer:

> That the provisions of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908," requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to submit to Congress classified and detailed reports of receipts and classified and detailed estimates and reports of expenditures by the Forest Service, and classified and detailed estimates and reports of every subject of expenditure by the Agricultural Department; statements showing all appointments, promotions, or other changes made in the salaries paid from lump funds, are hereby repealed.

Mr. President, I protest against making this a commercial proposition.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, we can not take cognizance of nor keep informed upon everything, so various are the measures before the Senate. It is to me, Mr. President, a surprise and a wonder that the provision which Congress put upon that appropriation bill holding this department and the bureaus of this department to accountability in reporting to Congress has ever been—I will not say repealed by the law—but that a suggestion of repeal should have been made. Will the Senator inform the Senate whether the provision he has read was in the House bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The provision which I have read comes from a document which I hold in my hand, calendar No. 1138, House bill 31596, which purports to be the agricultural appropriation bill, which passed the House of Representatives and is now in the Senate, reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, there is a general law that provides for making in detail reports of expenditures of the departments. When the money which came from the Forestry Service went straight into a general forestry fund for expenditure, instead of into the Treasury, and when there were no appointments under the civil-service regulations, and when the appropriation was in a lump sum for payment of salaries, hire of laborers, and so forth, there was a call made by law requiring a report, stating the name of every man in the Forest Service, when he commenced and when he finished, the amount paid him, and so forth. For some reason the House seemed to think that the general law requiring these reports was sufficient; and, therefore, they put in a clause in the pending bill repealing the particular act which requires such procedure, under which the matter was gone into in such detail that some seven or eight hundred pages were required. That is the whole story.

Mr. HALE. I think the repeal of that provision of law is very offensive and ought not to be consented to by the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. The bill as it came from the House has already been amended by the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], which not only strikes that out, but which requires a report far more in the line of particularity, a report which will require the bureau to go in extenso into a great many matters; for instance, as to how many dollars and cents are expended for each meal when traveling, the amount expended for each mile of travel, and so forth. That amendment is now in the bill.

Mr. HALE. I think that is right.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the section referred to should not only be left on the statute book, but there should be insistence by the Secretary of Agriculture or by the Congress upon compliance with the statute. For many years the Forest Service made general collections for forest use and the sale of timber. This amounted in one year to $750,000.

There was no law fixing anybody's salary. There was no provision of law directing the method of expenditure. Expenditures were made according to the sweet will of the bureau and the department, and there never has been any satisfactory statement rendered of the disbursements of that fund. Called upon at one time for a statement, it was presented in such jumbled and confused form that the law officer of the Department of Agriculture informed me within a week that there was no data within the possession of the Agricultural Department from which a statement could be made of the manner in which that large amount of money had been disbursed; that it would be necessary to go back to the vouchers in the Treasury Department in order to get some light upon the subject, and that that would require a considerable length of time.

I introduced an amendment covering the period of time from 1900 to 1910, inclusive of those years, directing specific questions to the department, which I hope will elicit an answer covering that large sum of money for which no adequate or satisfactory account has ever been given to Congress or the department.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I called attention to this part of the bill simply to show the apparent determination to build up a great institution or a great bureau in this Forest Service, and I called attention to it so that I might protest against the Western States of this Nation being exploited by any bureau as a business or commercial proposition. But it seems to me that that protest has been unheeded in the years that are past.

Now, I want simply to say that if it is to be exploited as a business and a commercial proposition, it is only just to demand from those who are at the head of that great commercial enterprise that they render unto the people and unto the Congress a true, just, and accurate statement of their expenditures.

As I said, Mr. President, I have only done this to record my protest, but I do believe that the time is coming when in the Congress of the United States a different policy will be determined upon and demanded, and if it were not for living in the hope of that better day the people of the Rocky Mountain States might just as well bid farewell to any hope of future prosperity.

Mr. PENROSE and Mr. WARREN. Question!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Which the committee has accepted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. I offer the following amendment, and while I am aware that it is subject to a point of order, at the same time I should like to explain in a few words to the Senate the meaning of it. The amount is $50,000.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, I must make the point of order if the Senator says the amendment is susceptible of it. On the other hand, the making of the point of order shuts out debate. I am perfectly willing to withhold the point of order for a moment if the Senator from Oklahoma wishes to explain it briefly.

Mr. OWEN. That is what I wish.

The amendment is:

Fifty thousand dollars for rewards and premiums to be distributed to the members of the corn clubs which have been or may be established by the Agricultural Department.

Of course the corn crop in this country is the greatest producer of value of any product, and the Agricultural Department has been stimulating the boys of the country with these corn clubs. In the State of Oklahoma there are over 5,000 members of these corn clubs. In some other States the membership is still larger, and it has been of very great value, not only stimulating the boys in the cultivation of corn, but, what is perhaps of equal importance, it has stimulated the attention of men engaged in the cultivation of corn.

The State of Iowa has doubled its production of corn by giving care to the question of seed selection and of proper cultivation, and the stimulation of these boys by offering them a small reward would be of very great commercial value to the people of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Insert in the bill the following words:

Fifty thousand dollars for rewards and premiums to be distributed to the members of the corn clubs which have been or may be established by the Agricultural Department.

Mr. WARREN. I make the point of order that it has not been estimated for and has not been recommended by any standing committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

TARIFF BOARD.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to call up the appropriation bill for the Post Office Department.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I prefer to proceed now with the unfinished business if it is agreeable to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I am extremely solicitous to have this bill acted on some time or other. I have been waiting around here for considerably over a week to be present when the bill could be called up, but, of course, I recognize the right which the Senator from Indiana has to have the unfinished business fairly and fully considered, and I will yield this time whatever claim I may have on the attention of the Senate for the appropriation bill. But I hope some time or other, to-night or to-morrow, certainly at the latest, I can have the Senate consider it.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 32010) to create a tariff board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to section 7, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, section 7, line 17, after the word "investigations," insert "as hereinbefore provided, including all testimony."

Mr. STONE. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again report the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, before proceeding further, I desire to make an inquiry and also a statement. I am curious to know who is in charge of this bill, now being the unfinished business before the Senate. I have the honor to be a member of the Finance Committee. There were amendments offered in the committee to the bill which were voted down, as is well known, and notice was given that amendments would be offered on the floor of the Senate. Those amendments will be offered in due time, and I have no doubt will be debated to a greater or less extent.

Mr. President, it is a rule or practice which has been followed long and consistently in the Senate—so far as I know it is practically without exception—that some member of the committee takes charge of the conduct and management of its bills on the floor. I am sure it will be difficult to find any striking exception to that rule when important bills—controverted measures—were under consideration.

This bill was reported to the Senate by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and I presumed, of course, he would have charge of it. But he seems to have disappeared—whether willingly or unwillingly I am not advised—but he has withdrawn by persuasion or force from the management of this bill which was committed to his hands by the committee.

Mr. President, this is a House bill. It passed the House of Representatives, in which body it was first introduced. It came to the Senate in due course and was referred to the Finance Committee. There it was debated at length and fully considered, and a majority of the committee determined to report it favorably. The Senator from Massachusetts was selected to discharge the important duty of reporting the bill and managing it on the floor of the Senate. I am curious to know why that Senator has surrendered this important right and duty.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. STONE. Just a moment, and I will yield to the Senator from Maine, who maybe can answer the inquiry I am about to propound. I hope he can. Is it possible that no Republican member of the Finance Committee is willing to take charge of this bill? It has been said, and so far as I know not denied, that there was not a member of the Finance Committee who favored this measure, and that those who voted to report it did so reluctantly. It may be that their opinion of it is so bad that no member of that committee dares to take the responsibility of trying to conduct it through the Senate of the United States.

I am curious to know how this unusual thing was brought about. The Senator from Maine is on the floor. He is an old and distinguished Senator of long service on the Finance Committee, a Republican of prominence and power and influence, and it may be that he can inform me upon this interesting subject.

Mr. HALE. I am in a condition of surprise. I supposed the Senator from Massachusetts was in charge of this bill. When it came up last night, he made the motion, and as a kind of insignia of authority when the motion had passed making it the unfinished business, he made the important motion, indicating leadership and control, to adjourn. I am surprised at what the Senator says. I supposed the Senator from Massachusetts was and is in charge of this bill.

I do not know of any process of legerdemain that ousts a member of a committee who has been directed to report a bill to the Senate, it having been duly referred to the committee, of the control and management of it, and I do not think my modest friend, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], would for a moment undertake to assume—I use that word with some knowledge of the extent of it—to take charge of this important bill, which was matured by the Ways and Means Committee in the House and referred to the Finance Committee of the Senate, duly considered there, if not, I will say, in a very enamored way, but with a feeling that it ought to be reported and submitted to the Senate by the committee to which it was intrusted; and under those conditions, I will not say groping about for somebody to report it, but being desirous that it should be reported by somebody who was in favor of it, the committee selected the eminent Senator from Massachusetts, not a novice, not a new, untried man, to launch this measure upon this body and to manage it here.

I am inclined to think certain members of the committee reserved the right as members of the committee to vote according to their own views of public policy upon it, but the Committee on Finance intrusted the measure to the Senator from Massachusetts, and until this moment I did not know, after what took place last night, the Senator from Massachusetts moving to adjourn when the bill had been taken up, that it was not an abandonment of his leadership, but an assertion of his leadership. I do not know, until the Senator who is a member of the committee made his protest, that the Senator from Massachusetts is not in charge of the bill. I agree with the Senator from Missouri, if there has been any process, any mechanical arrangement by which the cogwheels of ordinary senatorial procedure have been reversed and the Senator from Massachusetts has been displaced and has been succeeded by the eminent, eloquent, and able Senator from Indiana, I must assume without his consent, I would like to know what that process has been.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Maine a courteous question.

Mr. HALE. All the Senator's questions are courteous.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to be informed if this interesting colloquy between the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Missouri is a conspiracy.

Mr. HALE. Yes, Mr. President; it is the conspiracy which results from the union of two serious and honest minds in the same direction, if that is a conspiracy.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator allow me a word there?

Mr. HALE. Yes; two or three words.

Mr. MONEY. I do not want two. I would like to know if it is not an attempt to uncover a conspiracy.

Mr. HALE. I am an old hand here, and I have not seen anything like this before. I am used to mutations. I have seen majorities turned into minorities by the vote of the Senate. But I have never before known the charge of an important bill somehow, somewhere turned from one Senator, representing the committee, to another Senator, who does not represent the committee.

As to a conspiracy, as I said, the mind of the Senator from Missouri runs as mine does. I am curious to know, and I wish somebody would tell us, what this process or transformation was that ousted the Senator, if he is ousted—I did not suppose he was—from the control of this bill. I am free to say if the matter was in the air and it was a question that somebody should take charge of it, the eminent Senator from Indiana is a most proper man to take charge of it; but I should like to have the process unfolded. Would not the Senator from Missouri like to have the process unfolded?

Mr. STONE. The purpose of my inquiry was to unfold it.

Mr. HALE. There is another instance of the conspiracy between the Senator from Missouri and me. I await the disclosure of some deus ex machina.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will permit me, I am not only desirous, but I am overanxious, to know by what means this unusual proceeding took place.

Mr. HALE. I thought so.

Mr. STONE. There seemed to be an abandoned child.

Mr. HALE. Yes; a foundling.

Mr. STONE. I wanted to know if the Senator from Massachusetts had laid it on the doorstep of the Senator from Indiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. I think we ought to know whether this tariff-board bill is actually a foundling, that had nobody to assume its control, and was at last laid at the doorstep of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, this foundling, so called, came to the Senate of the United States from the House of Representatives. Its paternity is of unquestioned respectability. It has been reported to the Senate of the United States, and while I do not wish to impute any discredit to the Senator from Massachusetts, who is absent, by charging him with the maternity of the bill, his absence is a necessary excuse for not discussing this matter when he is not here. But at all events, it is before the Senate, and the Senate is abundantly capable of handling any bill which is brought before it and requires no leadership. There is every reason in the world why the bill should pass.

Mr. STONE. Allow me to correct the Senator. Do I understand the Senator to say that the Senator from Massachusetts was absent?

Mr. OWEN. I had not observed him in the chamber.

Mr. STONE. He has been here all the evening.

Mr. OWEN. I assumed that he was absent. But whether he is absent or present, this matter is now before the Senate as a Committee of the Whole, and each Member of the Senate is able to take charge of the bill if every other Member outside of a quorum were absent. I do not understand the extraordinary colloquy between the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Missouri. I thought perhaps it might be explained.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to be facetious, for this is a serious inquiry into the proper conduct of the affairs of the Senate. It should be explained by some one who knows how it happened that when the greatest committee in the Senate, in charge of a very important measure, had reported it and put it in charge of one of its members, here, at this stage, we find it now in the hands of a very distinguished gentleman, it is true, but not a member of that committee. We should be informed how that came to be. If there has been a precedent like this, I do not recall it in my pretty long service. It is very important, in order that the Senate may conduct its business in a proper way, that the committee that has had referred to it by the Senate a measure should also have charge of that measure when that committee reports it back to the Senate.

It would be a most disorderly proceeding if any man here, as was suggested by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, could take charge of a bill with which he had nothing to do in committee, a bill coming from a committee of which he was not a member.

Now, I do not know how this happened. There is some irregularity here just as patent as that we are here on this floor, and it is due to the Senate that somebody should explain to us before we proceed how this bill should suddenly disappear from the control of the Committee on Finance and get into the hands of the Chairman of the Committee on Territories.

This is no laughing matter. No man has a right to take charge of a bill unless by instruction of the committee which reports it. I deny that the Committee on Finance has had a meeting for this purpose or to consider this measure since it reported it. I for one supposed that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] had charge of the bill. He was authorized to report it and to take its management on the floor.

I do not know that there is any rule bearing on this question, but there is a uniform practice, and common decency and common sense are quite sufficient to carry home to the mind of every Senator here that there is no man on this floor outside of the committee that reports a bill who has any right whatever to take it in his keeping. It was not done by some sort of consent of the committee. I deny that that committee has consented to part with the management of this bill. I know that no Democrat here is aware of any such transaction or agreement between anybody. How did it happen, and when, and where, and by whom?

The Senator from Oklahoma speaks about a conspiracy here between two gentlemen to call up these questions. Of course he says that facetiously, and it is one of the vices of this age that nobody can talk about a serious question without being funny. A newspaper can not announce a death scene without being a little bit facetious. It is the vice of the time. This is a matter which can not be laughed down or explained away with a joke. The Senate owes it to itself to have it explained fully how the Committee on Finance has lost the charge of its own bill. I assure Senators that that must be explained.

I for one am not satisfied with this condition. The Senator from Indiana understands me well enough to know that there is no disparagement of him personally when I make this suggestion. I would say the same thing of any other Senator in the Chamber not a member of the committee who took charge of the bill, for certainly it is all wrong. It is out of the order of business. It is a severe reflection on the committee that sent it here, and, in some measure, it must be a reflection upon the gentleman who has been somehow or other ousted from the management. Whether he feels anything about it or not I do not know, but it is a serious matter for you to consider, Senators—whether this shall be a precedent. It certainly is a bad one and would lead to any kind of disorder. To-morrow any man could get up here and claim to manage one of your appropriation bills, and why not, if this is to go without any explanation whatever?

I do not believe it can be explained to the satisfaction of the Senate. It can not be explained to the satisfaction of the five Senators sitting on this side of the Chamber who are members of the committee that had charge of this measure. If this is a beginning here, where is it going to end? Instead of the orderly process of business it leads to a disorderly scramble to rise first and say, "I have charge of the bill." It is time it was settled, and it ought to be settled right now before we proceed with any consideration of the bill; and I would add that I do not know anybody more competent than the Senator from Indiana, who has charge of it, to tell how he got it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, more than four years ago I introduced in this body, as all Senators will remember, a bill substantially like the bill under discussion. Senators will find there is very little difference, certainly none in substance. I immediately spoke upon that measure after careful preparation. It was discussed, debated, and fought over for a long time both on the floor of the Senate and throughout the country. There are other Senators here who have given even more arduous service in behalf of a tariff board or a tariff commission than I have.

I moved to proceed to the consideration of this bill after I had conversed with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who said he was agreeable to that proposition. I take it, Mr. President, it is not so much a question as to who moves to proceed to the consideration of a measure as it is whether the measure is wise.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I listened with care and respect to what the Senator from Indiana said, but that does not explain how he gets this bill. It makes no difference if he made speeches 104 years ago. This is a House bill. It is not the child of the Senator from Indiana. It comes here in its regular way and it is referred to the Committee on Finance, which has charge of it. It has charge of it until the Senate has considered and passed or rejected it, and there is no authority on that side of the Chamber or in the whole Senate, as far as I know, unless unanimous consent will carry everything, that any other man except a member of that committee shall be put in charge of this important measure.

I would like to move to recommit this measure to the Committee on Finance that we may have a clearing of the atmosphere, and then if anybody has got a confession to make I should like to hear it. There is something rotten in the State of Denmark, or dead, or whatever the expression is. Something has been agreed to which the Senate has not heard of.

I was told this morning that there has been an agreement reached, by which two important matters before the Senate were to be taken up, by the gentlemen who opposed one and advocated the other and vice versa. Is this a part of that agreement? Let us be honest and frank with one another. We will all be away in three days. Why this shuffling at the very last moment? I want to enter my serious protest against this whole business.

Mr. President, I make the motion now that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Finance, and I hope the chairman will call that committee together and report it back as he did a few days ago. I will say with all respect to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], whom I esteem as one of the first Members of the Senate, that if he does not want to take charge of it I think some one else can be found on the committee to represent the committee in the management on this floor.

I make the motion, Mr. President, to recommit the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope that motion will not prevail. I believe the Senate could devote its time much more profitably to discussing the bill on its merits than to wrangling over who is technically in charge of it. I do not believe it is disclosing any secrets of the committee room to say that while many Senators who had been brought up in the old-fashioned school of protection were ready to vote for this measure, they were not full of enthusiasm for it. It seemed, however, to be demanded by many persons, and in deference to an unquestioned public sentiment they voted in favor of its report to the Senate, as any friend of the bill ought to do, with the amendments which I understand are entirely acceptable.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PENROSE. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I do not wish him to convey the impression that the members who voted for this bill were not in favor of it. I was one of the members on that committee, and as a member of the committee I am in favor of the passage of the bill and said in the committee—not simply that I was willing to let it pass but I want to see it pass the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. I entirely agree with the statement of the Senator from North Dakota, and I anticipate the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts that he was likewise one of its zealous members. Perhaps in making my statement I rather disclosed my own feelings on the matter, and while I am ready to vote for this measure I was not one of the original advocates of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desire to say, Mr. President, that I took a very great interest in this measure. I was thoroughly and heartily in favor of it. I was very glad to have the opportunity to report it and cause it to take its formal reading and have the amendments of the committee adopted.

My withdrawal from its charge was a matter which I assented to, so far as I am personally concerned, merely because I wished to facilitate the progress of the business of the Senate. I can only act for myself; the action of the Finance Committee is another matter.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct. I would hardly call him one of the original advocates of the tariff-board plan, but he has lately become a zealous advocate of it.

If there are any other members of the committee who were original and zealous friends of the measure, I will wait until they can make their statements, but, in the absence of others, I will say for myself that I am only too glad to have the help of the Senator from Indiana in bringing about the passage of this measure. He has been a genuine and original advocate of the proposition; he has addressed gatherings all over the United States in its favor; his public career is preeminently identified with it; and if the motion to recommit is made to kill the measure everyone who sincerely believes in the bill should endeavor to retain it before the Senate and let us have a chance to vote on it one way or the other.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I do not understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania means to affront anyone on this side by saying that the purpose of raising this point is to defeat the measure. If he conceives that to be the idea, he is entirely mistaken. I am opposed to the proposed tariff commission, and I think it is pretty well known that I have some amendments to offer to the bill; but I shall not filibuster a moment, and I have never done so. I am not delaying anything here, but I am proceeding to a point which the Senator has carefully dodged.

I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what prevailed upon him or what made him believe that he was facilitating the passage of this measure when he resigned its charge to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]? Why does the Senator from Massachusetts think that under the management of the senior Senator from Indiana, not a member of the Finance Committee, this bill would fare any better than under his able management, with his zeal for its passage?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it would not be proper for me to reveal a private conversation, but I was satisfied that my standing aside would facilitate the agreement which has enabled us to dispose of the Lorimer case and to bring this matter before the Senate. I did not desire any personal feeling on my part, or any desire on my part to conduct the bill, which I should have been very glad to have done, to stand in the way of the settlement of the Lorimer case, on which I thought we ought to vote, or the bringing of this measure before the Senate, which I was most anxious to have done.

Mr. MONEY. Now, Mr. President, we are getting a little information.

Mr. LODGE. And I very gladly yielded to representations that were made to me on that point.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I feel like a woman picking a cork out of a bottle with a hairpin. I now understand that there was some sort of an agreement made by gentlemen who wanted to vote for Mr. LORIMER with the gentlemen who wanted this bill considered, that the two should unite, and then the bill was transferred from the Committee on Finance to the Committee on Territories. I do not understand that under any rule of the Senate such a thing has ever been done before, and I do not believe it is proper now. I gave good reasons for what I mean by this awhile ago, and it is unnecessary to repeat them, but I say the Senate ought not to proceed with this measure until we know how the Senator from Indiana got control of a bill that belonged to the Finance Committee. If any gentlemen here thinks I am delaying, he is mistaken.

I do not consume time for nothing. This is an important question. It is not simply the fate of this bill that is involved, but it is the fate of measures that will come up hereafter, whether they shall be proceeded with or whether they shall not, or whether some agreement or some logrolling by gentlemen on one side or the other of this Chamber shall dispossess the committee—the whole committee, the Democratic as well as the Republican side—of its charge and commit it to a gentleman, of distinction, it is true, who is not on the committee and whom the Senate never did intrust with it; it never sent it to the committee to which he belonged; it was not intended by the Senate that he should have charge of it. If the gentlemen on the other side are so reluctant to proceed with it, I think they can find some one on this side who would take it up and present to the Senate amendments reported by the committee, as well as other amendments, and give the bill a fair show. Certainly it is a most serious thing to the Senate whether this disorderly business shall go on in this way by an agreement made in secret and not in the face of the whole Senate. It ought to be determined by the Senate, and the only way I know of to determine it is to recommit the bill and let it come back to-morrow morning. I do not know any other way, unless somebody will tell us a little more of what was done in the secret room.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to recommit the bill.

Mr. MONEY. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. PENROSE. Unless the Senator desires to press that motion, I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Mississippi, so far as he is concerned, will let this matter stand for the present to-night, and let us go on with the appropriation bill.

Mr. MONEY. I have no objection to this matter standing, and I have no objection to it coming up and passing; but it certainly must be settled in some way.

Mr. HALE. Well, let it go over.

Mr. MONEY. I am perfectly willing to let it go over, or I am willing to vote on it or do anything else with it. I myself would prefer that we go on with the appropriation bills before we call this up. We have only got two or three more days to pass upon them. Another thing: The Senator will recollect that there is important executive business that ought to be attended to, and it was very much desired and hoped that there would be an executive session to-night. I am one of those who would like to have it to-night, and there are quite a number of others who have spoken to me about it.

Mr. HALE. I think we ought to have it.

Mr. MONEY. I think so. So far as the bill in charge of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is concerned, I think the bill ought to be brought up and ought to be considered; but I would dislike very much to see a gentleman from the Committee on Territories in charge of the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

Mr. PENROSE. I withdraw my request, if it is not satisfactory to the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to recommit the bill.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I will withdraw that motion if the Senator from Pennsylvania is permitted to go on with the Post Office appropriation bill. I do not want to delay any matter here. I should like to see the Post Office appropriation bill acted on, and I am willing to vote on this measure whenever I can, but it ought to be here under proper management. If the Senator from Pennsylvania wants to proceed with the Post Office appropriation bill, I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi withdraw his motion?

Mr. MONEY. I do if the Senator from Pennsylvania can get consent to go on with his appropriation bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if it is satisfactory to the Senator having the unfinished business in charge, I will make the request; if it is not, I will withdraw it. The hour is getting late and probably we could make some progress with the Post Office appropriation bill and take up the other measure in a better frame of mind to-morrow.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the friends of this measure, who I trust are in a substantial majority, and whose frame of mind I hope I apprehend correctly, think, and I myself think, speaking for myself, that we should proceed with the consideration of the pending measure.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I withdraw my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I could not understand exactly the remarks made by the Senator from Indiana. If he wants to go on with the bill, I move to recommit, and I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance; and on that motion he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Again I announce my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am requested to state that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I am informed that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has not voted. I have a pair with that Senator and therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 51, as follows:

So the motion to recommit was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to section 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I desire to offer. I want, however, to say a word before I do so.

It is now lacking 25 minutes of 11 o'clock. I do not know what the purpose is on the other side, but I understood that this evening we were going to have an executive session. It is not likely we shall sit here all night and work all day to-morrow, and I should like to know whether it is the intention to have an executive session to-night, because if I offer this amendment I will have to speak, and I do not want to do that.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as I am concerned, I do not wish to have an executive session to-night.

Mr. MONEY. Very well. Then I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The Secretary read amendments proposed by Mr. MONEY, as follows:

On page 1, line 4, strike out all after the word "of" down to and including the word "annum," in line 14, on page 2, and insert the words "10 members, 5 of whom shall be Members of the Senate of the Sixty-first and the Sixty-second Congresses and shall be appointed by the President of the Senate, and 5 of whom shall be Members of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-first and the Sixty-second Congresses and shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The members appointed under this act shall continue in office for the term of six years, and any vacancy occurring during said term of six years shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. The chairman of the said board shall be selected by the members of the board. Not more than three Senators and three Members of the House of Representatives appointed on said board shall be members of the same political party. Six members of said board shall constitute a quorum. The term of any Member of either House of Congress appointed under this act shall expire and terminate when he shall cease to be a Member of Congress."

On page 3, line 23, strike out all after the word "aiding" down to and including the word "Government," in line 24.

On page 4, line 3, strike out the words "to enable the President."

On page 4, line 14, strike out the words "as the President shall direct" and insert the words "when called upon by the President or either House of Congress."

On page 5, line 19, strike out the words "the President or to;" and in line 20 strike out the words "the President;" and in line 21 strike out the word "or."

Mr. MONEY. I dislike extremely, Mr. President, to take the time of the Senate at this late hour, but this amendment seems to me to be worthy of some consideration.

In framing this Government of ours, one of the main ideas was to secure the permanence of our institutions by strictly dissociating the powers of the three distinct branches, and the object of the founders was to be carried out by preserving, so far as we could, this strict dissociation of power.

The framing of a tariff bill is the work of Congress. The work of framing a tariff is devolved originally upon the House of Representatives. The bill comes to this body for its amendments, and the concurrence of both Houses being obtained, it meets the approval or veto of the President. The Constitution has invested the President with authority to make such recommendations for legislation as he may think wise and proper, and has invested him with the power to veto a bill which is not in his judgment proper and wise, or constitutional, or for any other reason.

There is no reason that I know of why the President should be intruded into this business any further than the Constitution permits him to go. If the business is to be transacted, as it will be, by the Committee on Ways and Means in the House and the Committee on Finance in the Senate, they are quite as competent to choose the instrumentalities which will aid them in obtaining information of any kind as the President possibly can be, and there is not the slightest necessity of introducing him into the work, not authorized by the Constitution, or providing for the Congress of the United States an agent and instrument by which they are to get the information to frame their legislation.

I venture to say there is not a member of the committee who is not quite competent for the task of getting all the information that they need or that is to be gotten at all by anybody, as much so as the commission appointed by the President.

The object of this amendment is to exclude the President from a share in legislation to which I do not think he is entitled. On the same principle are framed the Waterways Commission and the Monetary Commission. I thought these were wise measures. They confined it to the two Houses, with the power to act, and with the right to secure information by the means they thought best.

The amendments which are submitted after this are simply to make the whole bill accord with the amendment I have offered to the first section.

I have not heard any particularly good argument why this commission should be had at all, because it is quite evident, to my mind, that the agents or experts of a committee can get by the order of that committee everything that can be obtained by a commission; and certainly I am opposed to any commission that has an indefinite extension of life. It ought to be limited to six years, so that Congress can discontinue it or continue it as it thinks proper. But it should not be put upon the bench for life, as you would a judge, a member of an independent branch of the Government. I do not see that there can be any particular information obtained by a commission from my own experience with commissions.

I recollect about 30 years ago, or probably a little longer, that a commission of extremely good men, it was admitted, nonpartisan in character, was appointed to frame a tariff bill or to get information for it. They did get the information, and they framed the bill. That bill was brought to the House of Representatives and referred to the Ways and Means Committee, and as that committee reported it it was an entirely different bill. When the House proceeded to act on the committee's bill they brought forth a third bill, totally different from the two, vitally different. It was sent to this body, referred to the Committee on Finance, and they produced the fourth bill—all of them extremely unlike. It came into the Senate, and the Senate set all four of them aside and produced the fifth bill, and it went to conference, and the conferees made an almost out and out new bill.

So you see my experience with commissions does not warrant me to believe that they can do any better than the committees can, and I venture to say that the information obtained in the last debate here was quite as good as will be obtained by any commission. By the kindness of the gentlemen of the Republican Party, the minority were permitted to select two experts of their own, and I am quite sure that those two experts obtained as much information as any commission that will ever sit, authorized or appointed by either the President or Congress.

I have not the strength to go on if I would, and I have no desire in the world to consume time. I presented this just as briefly as I could, and I hope the Senate will consider it favorably.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it is not necessary for me to supplement what the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] has already said, but I will ventue to detain the Senate long enough to add to what he has said a consideration which strongly appeals to my mind in favor of his amendment as against the provision of the bill.

If this board is left to the appointment of the President, then no information desired by any Senator can be obtained from it or through it except upon the demand of one or the other House of Congress or the President; but if the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is adopted, any Senator or any Representative can obtain any day in the year any information which he might desire.

As the bill now stands, a Senator might in the preparation for a debate upon a tariff measure desire some special information, but if the Congress was not then in session he could not obtain it except by the grace of a presidential commission; and I have some doubt if that commission, under the provision of the pending bill, would be permitted to furnish it. On the other hand and under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, any Senator desiring this information, no matter whether Congress were at adjournment or in session, could apply to any member of the commission and that member of the commission could direct the experts to prepare and furnish that information without delay.

Perhaps I can illustrate the difference between the two propositions more clearly by supposing a case. If the Senator from Mississippi desired to make preparation for a debate, and he sought information which had been obtained by this presidential commission, he could not obtain it except by waiting until the Senate convened, and then by resolution or request the Senate obtained it for him.

But if the commission should be appointed, as he proposes, and he should want this information, he could apply by an ordinary letter, in which he stated what he wanted, to any Senator who happened to be a member of that commission, and that Senator would simply transmit the letter of the Senator from Mississippi, together with a letter of his own, directing the experts of the commission to furnish the information desired. It seems to me that this is obviously more advantageous than the method proposed in the bill itself.

I take it that other Senators are not different in their situations from me, and I know that many times when we are not in session I need and I desire particular knowledge with reference to some item or some schedule, and that often happens when we have no tariff bill under consideration or in contemplation. I have heretofore supposed that it was my duty to obtain that information by my own labor or at my own expense, but if we are to provide an educational bureau for Senators and Representatives we at least ought to devise it in a way to answer their purpose when and as they need the knowledge.

I can easily conceive how this commission constituted as the Senator from Mississippi now proposes could be made most useful to every Senator. Not to every Senator in framing a tariff bill, because I frankly say that the only knowledge I need in framing a bill, according to my conception of such a measure, is the amount of revenue which the Government must collect through the customhouses and a list of the imports for the immediately preceding years. I do not conceive it to be the duty, and indeed I do not conceive it to be within the power, of Congress in framing a tariff bill to consider the difference in the cost of production here and abroad. But that question I reserve for a discussion when the bill is on its passage; and I content myself now with earnestly advocating this amendment, if the bill is to become a law.

I do not doubt that some Senators and some Representatives stand badly in need of information on the tariff as well as on all other subjects, and if the American people are to be taxed to educate their representatives, in addition to the salaries they now pay them, I am not sure that they ought to stop this educational process with this single question.

But, sir, if it is information we want, tell me why experts within our own power and subject to our own control can not furnish us with it better than a presidential commission? If it is information that we want, under the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi we can employ the same experts, and we can require them to collect the same information as the presidential board. The only difference between the presidential and the congressional commission is this: The presidential commission will make a report and the congressional commission will not; and there, Mr. President, lies the significance of this very earnest effort to establish this presidential board. Political parties sometimes change in midadministration, but this presidential board will not.

Apply the condition which exists to-day. Under the Constitution of the United States a revenue bill must originate in the House of Representatives. I am not just exactly clear how long this provision of the Constitution will be respected and observed, seeing that the President now assumes and asserts the right to initiate revenue measures in the shape of these trade agreements. But so long as the Constitution is obeyed, all revenue bills must originate in the House of Representatives.

If the next House, soon to assemble—sooner, I am told, than under the Constitution it would regularly assemble—is convened, as the President will have the right to convene it, in an extraordinary session, it will proceed at once, if it does its duty, and as it is Democratic I must assume that it will do its duty, to frame a tariff bill, and yet it must take its recommendations and its information from a presidential commission, the majority of whose members will be Republicans. Just exactly what wise advice a Republican majority of a presidential commission would give a Democratic House is one of the mysteries of modern legislation that passes entirely beyond my comprehension.

When the Democratic House takes this presidential commission's recommendation it will do it precisely as the Senator from Mississippi recites that Congress has done with other commissions and other recommendations. It will proceed to lay it on the table or proceed to put it in the desk, and it will do its work according to its own judgment and not according to the advice and recommendation of men who disagree with it on this tariff question as widely as the poles.

But they tell us that the President will appoint experts and politicians; but the more expert they are the worse it will be, for I do not consider their advice of any special value to men charged with the high and grave duty of levying taxes upon these people. If they are a board of experts, and if they are continued long in office, they will control the American Congress in making its tariff bills as often as the majority of the Congress happens to belong to the same political party as the majority of that commission. This is neither more nor less than a solemn proposal to abdicate the power of the American Congress to a board composed of men not selected by it.

They also tell us that we will thus take the tariff question out of politics. At the risk of offending the business interests of this country, who talk so glibly as if all politicians were unworthy of public confidence—and by the way, the business people of the country, and not the muckrakers, originated that idea, for ever since I was a boy I have heard men talking about the business of the country being disturbed by the politicians—I will say that this Government can not be administered for the business interests alone.

Sir, when you take the great question of taxation out of American politics you take from the American people one of their highest incentives to interest themselves in governmental affairs. Withdraw from the decision of the electors this momentous question which has divided parties since the infancy of the Republic, this momentous question which has divided the people in every country on the globe, remove it from politics, and you will remove half the public interest in your elections. If there is any class, if there is any occupation, if there is any industry that can only be saved only by abating the interest of the American people in their own Government, I am willing to see it abandoned. There are, sir, better things in this world than material prosperity. There are higher considerations than the profits of commerce or the accumulation of wealth. I would rather see my countrymen free and poor than to see them rich and indifferent to their institutions and their freedom.

The recommendation which has been made by all the advocates of this measure, the promises which have been printed by all the papers now supporting it, that we will relieve the business of the country from the constantly recurring disturbances of a tariff discussion, do not appeal to my mind. But, Mr. President, even if that were desirable, I am by no means certain that it is attainable in this way.

We now revise the tariff, and if well revised the business of the country adjusts itself to the law and proceeds in peace and without the fear of another disturbance for 10 or 12 years, when we have another revision adjusted to the new and changed conditions.

But under this proposal we will never have any industrial or commercial peace, because what industry, sir, will take a bond that these five wise gentlemen will not recommend to the very next session of Congress a change in some tariff schedule? No man can give his orders, no man can sell his goods, to be delivered at some future time, if a session of Congress is to intervene, without being more or less uncertain as to the prices which he must pay for his raw material and the prices at which his competitors may sell the same article.

Oh, no, sir; this proposal to set a tariff mill at an eternal grind is not a proposal to give stability and repose to legitimate and useful industry. It will not do that, but it will relieve the American people of taking great questions into consideration by turning them over to a board of experts.

Mr. President, I am not in the habit of flattering the American Congress, although I think better of it than the people seem to do. Perhaps that is because I have been longer with it and closer to it than the people. It has its shortcomings; it has its deficiencies; and those shortcomings and those deficiencies vary according to its politics, being greater when the Republicans are in power and less when the Democrats control. But, sir, whatever its shortcomings and whatever its deficiencies are, the American Congress, as a whole, is quite capable of taking good care of the interests of the American people.

Sometimes I have wondered how a man both honest and wise could advocate a protective tariff. Sometimes I have thought the Republicans were honest and not wise; and sometimes I have thought they were wise and not honest. But that was simply the distemper of a moment, and when I come to remember those whom I have known in intimate association I believe they are both wise and honest. If I am ever tempted to doubt your honesty and your wisdom I resist that temptation by remembering that Henry Clay devised your system. He has been gathered to the fathers long enough for the bitterness of party spirit and the intensity of party rivalry to accord him the full measure of honor and the full measure of confidence to which his fame, his patriotism, and his wisdom entitle him. Much as I might differ from them, I can not doubt that the men in this day who believe in and advocate the American policy inaugurated and defended with such consummate ability by the greatest statesmen of his school and State must not be suspected either as to their wisdom or as to their patriotism.

Then, when I turn to my own side and the long line of illustrious statesmen who have combated and who have successfully combated that doctrine, I no more doubt them than I doubt you. It is a conflict of ideas, sir, and out of that conflict, if there does not come justice as exact as I would like to have it, there does come a decision at least sanctified by the disinterested and unselfish patriotism of the majority.

I believe in the wisdom and in the patriotism of the American Congress absolutely, and I am not willing to abdicate its power over the greatest question that ever engaged the thoughtful attention of the American people. If you gentlemen on the other side are willing to say that you have not sense enough to use the information which you have or that you have not information enough to utilize the sense you have, perhaps I ought not to challenge your poor opinion of yourselves; but, although you are willing to stand before the American people and say that while your fathers who professed your faith could make great tariff bills under which these people grew and prospered as no other people in the history of the world have ever grown and prospered, still their sons and their descendants are not as capable as their fathers, I would save you from that humiliating position if I could.

You are not willing to rise over there, one after another, and confess that you must have somebody help you make a tariff bill, or that you are incapable of making one, and yet what not one of you would do individually you all seem anxious to do collectively.

This is one of the few united Republican votes that the roll calls of this session will show. By reading the RECORD in the morning it will be impossible to tell who is an insurgent and who is a standpatter. In fact, Mr. President, some of the insurgents are standing pat, and some of the standpatters are insurging on this question. A united party asking the country to commission you to govern it, and yet confessing yourselves incapable of doing it is a spectacle not reassuring to the American people. But we will save you from that embarrassment if you will simply let this bill go over until the next session. We will introduce to the American people a confident Democratic majority which will not ask the aid of people who can not be elected to Congress to help them frame a measure of taxation.

I saw one of my friends on that side smile when I said "if you would let that bill go over until the next session of Congress," and he smiled a half-suspicious and half-cynical smile, as if he thought I intimated a filibuster by that. But I did not so intend it. I was not a party to the agreement over there, and I was not called into the council; but I think I was permanently cured of the filibustering habit by the operations of the other night, and I do not intend to filibuster on this bill.

While I am at this point, Mr. President, I want to refer to another matter, and I do it with great hesitation, because I think the last word on the Lorimer case ought to have been spoken before the roll was called. Intending to say what I am now about to say, I sent to the committee room of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] awhile ago to ask him to come, and I am satisfied he is about the Chamber somewhere. I did not have an opportunity to make this statement immediately after he spoke, because the roll was called as soon as he concluded his observations. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] declared to-day that a vote was resisted by those who believe the election of the Senator from Illinois to be valid, when it was supposed that the vote would be different from what the RECORD showed it to-day. Of course, I do not know what information the Senator from Wisconsin had, but I want to say here in the presence of the Senate, and I want to have it written in this enduring record, that never at any time or under any circumstances did I countenance a suggestion of a filibuster on that question. I was asked more than once if there would be a vote on the Lorimer question, when it was supposed the vote would be adverse to the opinion which I held, and in every instance I answered that there would be a vote if it were within my power to force it. I even went so far as to say that if the Senator from Illinois would countenance or encourage an attempt to prevent the Senate from voting on the question of his right to his seat, though I would not change my vote on this particular matter, I would change my opinion of him.

Mr. President, I have felt that I ought to say this much in justice to myself, though I have no idea that the Senator from Wisconsin had me in his mind; indeed, I am sure he did not, because there could have been not the slightest basis for a statement of that kind with reference to me.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNTER. Will the Senator allow me? I should like to say in this same connection that there never was a time during the consideration of that case, however much I was interested in the result of it, that I would have given aid or countenance in any way to a filibuster on that question. The Senator from Texas and I discussed that on more than one occasion, and we were both agreed upon it.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true.

Mr. PAYNTER. I want to say further in defense of the chairman of the committee, I do not think at any time he had any purpose to delay the vote upon that question beyond the time when Senators could get through with the discussion.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BAILEY. Has the Senator from Massachusetts taken charge of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President; I am not taking charge of the bill, but I am making a suggestion about the time of meeting.

Mr. BAILEY. I wanted to understand the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, would not 10 o'clock suit the Senator better?

Mr. LODGE. I make it 11 o'clock because, I understand, the Committee on Appropriations have a meeting in the morning; but I should be glad to make it 10 o'clock. My impression is that that would be just as well.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I desire to suggest that notice has been sent to members of that committee that there will be a meeting to-morrow morning, and that all members are expected to be present, because there will be a hearing by the committee.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I call for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. He being absent, I will withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, owing to the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], with whom I have a pair, I withhold my vote. I make that announcement for all votes for the evening.

Mr. FLINT. As I have heretofore stated, I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire whether the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a pair with that Senator and therefore desire to withdraw my vote.

I am also requested to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. The senior Senator from Maryland is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

I am also requested to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], with whom I paired, has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 48, as follows:

So Mr. MONEY's amendment was rejected.

EFFICIENCY OF ORGANIZED MILITIA.

Mr. DIXON. I ask unanimous consent to report favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (S. 9292) to further increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, and for other purposes, with amendments, and to submit a report (No. 1266) thereon. I make this request now, in order that we may get the bill as amended printed by to-morrow morning.

Mr. BACON. What is the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana desires to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs. Is there objection to receiving the report?

Mr. BACON. Is that the House bill on the subject?

Mr. DIXON. The House has passed a bill and the Senate committee has reported a different bill. We want it reported to-night, so that we can get the bill printed by to-morrow morning in order that we may compare the bill that the House has passed with the one the Senate committee has reported.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is not asking for any action now?

Mr. DIXON. Oh, no.

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that to-morrow at the conclusion of the routine morning business I will address the Senate briefly on the subject of Canadian reciprocity.

TARIFF BOARD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 32010) to create a tariff board.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I trust the Senator in charge of this bill will not insist on a vote to-night.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to offer an amendment. I move to strike out all of section 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas moves an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 5 of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I would not object to the commission or the board, or whatever it may be called, having the power to subpœna witnesses, provided their obedience to the subpœna was left to their voluntary action; but this bill requires them to come and to produce their books and their papers. In order that the Senate may have that provision before it, I will ask the Secretary to read the section which I have moved to strike out and upon which I desire to base some remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the section proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

SEC. 5. That for the purposes of this act said board shall have power to subpœna witnesses, to take testimony, administer oaths, and to require any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association engaged in the production, importation, or distribution of any article under investigation to produce books and papers relating to any matter pertaining to such investigation. In case of failure to comply with the requirements of this section, the board may report to Congress such failure, specifying the names of such persons, the individual names of such firm or copartnership, and the names of the officers and directors of each such corporation or association so failing, which report shall also specify the article or articles produced, imported, or distributed by such person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association, and the tariff schedule which applies to such article.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it is perfectly plain to the lawyers of this body that Congress possesses no power to compel an American citizen to produce his books and exhibit the secrets of his business. If a corporation is charged with a crime, perhaps it has been held that it can be compelled to produce its books, even though those books bear testimony against it. That was going a long way. Still, I offer no criticism against that decision, because there it was charged that a crime was being committed against the law and that the protection of the Constitution did not extend to these arificial persons. But to assume and to assert that Congress has the power, in order to educate its Members and qualify them for the discharge of their duty, is an absurdity on its face. These people have their business secrets, and they are entitled to immunity from the curiosity of a Government official.

Mr. President, if I were engaged in business, no commission Congress could create would ever be permitted to look into my books, and the more honestly they were kept the more certainly I would guard them against this inquisitorial and visitorial power of men who say that they do not know how to make laws unless they can invade the offices of our various business enterprises and compel them to subject their business—their profits, their losses, and their capital—to the scrutiny of Government officials.

We have already perpetrated this folly. We incorporated a similar but more drastic provision in the census bill, but no officer of the Government has attempted to enforce it, because they knew it could not be enforced. Under a power to enumerate the people for the purposes of representation, Congress can not confer the power to punish a man because he will not help to enumerate cattle and hogs. Neither can we, under our power to levy taxes, compel the taxpayer to do more than to render a full list of the property which we desire to tax.

The American Congress does itself no credit to write into these bills a provision that is mere brutum fulmen, if the power of the General Government is challenged in that respect. Analyze it. Here we are, saying to the world that we do not know how to legislate with the information before us, and in order to educate ourselves we must invade the privacy of every business office in this land, inspect their books, and for what? In order to ascertain their profits, so that we may measure out to them a protection that will exactly cover the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, plus a profit to the manufacturer.

I would almost consent to pass this bill with this provision in it if I thought some officer would try to compel one of these men to produce their books. For then, sir, we could bring the question squarely before the court whether the Government possesses this power, and as incidental to that question we could probably induce the court to say whether the Government has the power to levy taxes to cover the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad.

That, sir, would not be a question of taxation. That, sir, would not be a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce. I do not doubt that Congress has power, even by taxation, to regulate interstate and foreign commerce where taxation is a fit instrument to execute that purpose. But if we could get this question on this provision before the court by the refusal of some man affected by it to obey the subpœna issued under it, we could raise the question, first, as to whether the citizen can be compelled to open his books in order to educate Congress, and if that should be decided in the affirmative it could only be by the court deciding it upon the theory that this education was necessary in order not to levy taxes, but to extend a protection which would cover the difference between the cost of production here and abroad, plus a profit to the home manufacturer.

It is only and precisely this purpose which you seek to serve by this provision. You want every man to lay before the American Congress his profit and loss account, so that you can adjust your tariff to reduce his profits if they are too large and to enlarge his profits if they are now too small. In other words, sir, you are proposing to read into the statutes the promise of the Republican party that every manufacturer shall have, over and above the cost of production, a fair profit on his enterprise.

Who else in this American Republic is guaranteed a profit on his business? Who guarantees the farmer a profit? No one. He takes the chances of flood and drought. He takes the chances of insects and pests. He assumes a risk assumed by no other man, a risk so great that Thomas Jefferson, a farmer himself—and, by the way, the most intelligent farmer the world ever knew; a farmer who knew all about the soil and its properties; a farmer who knew all about arboriculture as well as agriculture; a farmer who knew all about horticulture as well as arboriculture and agriculture—and yet this greatest of all men, this most accomplished of all farmers, was moved by the vicissitudes of his class to say that the farmers were the greatest gamblers in the world, meaning it in no offensive sense, but simply seeking to emphasize the great risks which they take. And yet you offer them no guaranty of profit; you propose to levy no taxes on others to insure the prosperity of their farms; but they and all other classes are to be burdened in order that this Government may keep its pledge that the protected manufacturers shall be insured a fair profit.

I warn you gentlemen on the other side that you must answer for this. The people will not agree that any one class shall be separated from all others, and that from the earnings and the savings of those others shall be guaranteed a profit on their business. You will not be able to answer to the farmers any more, that you are guaranteeing their profits as well as others after your reciprocity with Canada; for under that agreement almost everything the farmer produces goes on the free list, and almost everything the farmer buys stays on the dutiable list. It is true you do give him automobile parts free. You tax his flour, but you let him go after it in an untaxed automobile. Oh, splendid generosity!

You confess that you do not know as much as you ought to know by wanting somebody to teach you; and I am going to teach you now. Your Canadian reciprocity is going to disappoint the cities because it will not reduce the cost of living to any appreciable extent. The number of articles affected by it, the area from which those articles come, is altogether too restricted to produce any appreciable effect on general prices, and therefore when your Canadian reciprocity is in full operation, if it ever is, the people in the overcrowded cities and industrial centers will soon discover that you have broken your word of promise to their hope, though you may claim to have kept it to their ear.

The price of living will not be reduced 2 per cent even in the cities nearest the Canadian border, because the articles from which you take the duty constitute only a very small part of every household's expense, and you take the duty from those articles generally in the shape where the people can not consume them and leave the duty on them in the shape in which the people do consume them.

Let us suppose that you pass your Canadian agreement, and we do not succeed in putting our tariff bill on the statute books. Then you are to be tried by your bill and your agreement, and your reduction in the cost of living will not net 1 per cent on the average family's expenses. I know what you hope to do, and I suspect that is what some of you intend to do. You want an excuse to say to the people of the country it was not the tariff that caused the high cost of living. You are seeking to give the people an object lesson, so that you can say that you had given them free trade with Canada, and that did not reduce the cost of living; and then the insurgents will disappear and the standpatters will again take charge of the Republican Party.

I do not lightly suspect the motives or the sincerity of men, but it is impossible for me to believe that any man who is wise enough to be President of the United States expects much out of that Canadian agreement. If he did, he would not have made wheat free and left the duty on flour.

He will not even catch the millers by that kind of a bait, and I will tell you why. He will catch the American millers along the Canadian border, because he is giving them their wheat free and leaving a duty on their flour. With his free wheat, these American millers can invade the territory now occupied by southern and southwestern millers, and they will invade it, or perhaps I would speak more accurately to say they will encroach upon it. With free wheat and taxed flour, they will be protected against their Canadian competitors, because it will cost the Canadian mills just as much to ship the flour as it will cost the American mills to ship the wheat, and so freight will cancel freight in that contest for trade, and the 50 cents per barrel duty on Canadian flour will amply protect the American miller in his own country and with his own trade.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. I am delighted to do so.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Texas, I venture to interpose a remark at this time, to the end that the attitude of the State Department and the President, as I understand that attitude, may be clearly set forth.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator will be able to explain it. I doubt if the principals could.

Mr. CARTER. The statement will explain itself. It is true that cattle are to be admitted free. It is true that wheat is to be admitted free, and that meat is to be subject to a duty, and that flour is likewise to be subject to a duty. Let me say now that that was not at the option or in conformity with the will or desire of the United States. The Canadian people feared competition with the millers of the United States. Desiring to build up a milling industry in Canada, they have established a protective duty on flour. Desiring to build up a packing business, they have prescribed certain protective duties on the introduction of meat into Canada.

Our State Department was entirely agreeable to the free admission or the interchange of meat products between the two countries just as has been arranged with regard to cattle, but the Canadians said: "Nay; our packers can not compete with the American packers." The State Department was prepared to have free flour——

Mr. BAILEY. But we could have taken it off of Canadian meat and flour coming into our country without requiring Canada to take it off of American meat and flour going into Canada.

Mr. CARTER. Permit me to finish this statement.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

Mr. CARTER. The State Department was prepared to remove the duty off meat and have meat, as well as flour, passed freely across the line. I understand the fact to be that an amendment admitting meat free from Canada will be agreeable to the Department of State and not obnoxious to the agreement; that the free admission of flour from Canada will not be opposed; but if we provide for a reciprocal arrangement whereby our meat products can enter Canada free of duty, whereby our flour can enter Canada free of duty, the Canadians will refuse to comply, because they desire to maintain their protective tariff as to meat and flour.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, there would have been no trouble in leaving the duty on flour and meat going from this country into Canada and taking it off the meat and flour coming from Canada into this country. They have done that with other articles in this very agreement. Does not the Senator from Montana know that?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, my understanding is that in certain instances that is correct; but if in the judgment of the Congress it is desirable to allow Canadian meats and flour to enter the United States free of duty, while our citizens pay a duty for entering the Canadian markets with those products, there will be no objection so far as the State Department is concerned, and no obstruction placed in the way of the ratification of the agreement.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the duty on cattle is $2 per head on the cheapest cattle that would come from Canada and less than 30 per cent on the best. When you talk about such a duty on cattle and 55 per cent duty on cheap clothing you begin to understand the difference between the treatment of the farmer and the treatment of the manufacturer, even under the present law, and by this agreement to strip the former of all advantage. No wonder the Senator from Iowa is opposed to this. The wonder to me is that any man who represents an agricultural constituency could consent to such a gross and indefensible discrimination.

Mr. President, I am going to ask the Senator from Montana this question for future use: If this agreement fails to reduce the cost of living, does not the Senator from Montana intend then to stand up and tell the people that it thus proves that the increased cost of living was not attributable to the protective tariff?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, although opposed on principle to dealing in futures, I am inclined to sympathize with the view of the Senator from Texas that perfectly free and unrestricted trade with Canada on her productions will cut little figure in the domestic economy or the markets of the United States. What I do think of the subject in a broader sense may be briefly stated in this connection.

The Canadians have a climate much like our own, but a little more severe. They must buy overcoats in that country, just as they buy them in North Dakota and Montana. It is a little more expensive to live in a country where the seasons are short for crop raising and the winters are long, where houses must be built more substantially for the protection of the people during the winter season, where stock must be housed in a more secure and comfortable line of quarters. The people speak the same language. They receive in the main the same pay for their labor. Thousands of our people have gone into Canada and a very large number of Canadians have come into this country. The Canada of 20 years ago is not the Canada of to-day. Great transcontinental railways have extended or are being extended from ocean to ocean.

Mr. BAILEY. And wheat fields faster than railroads.

Mr. CARTER. Wheat fields are developing, and they are largely being developed by former citizens of Iowa and North Dakota and Minnesota and Montana—men who are familiar with the American standards of living. The competition with a people thus situated is not an unequal competition; but, Mr. President, competition with a man of India raising wheat is unequal competition; competition with a man of the Argentine Republic is unequal competition; competition with a man of South Africa is not fair competition; and I would prefer relaxing the grip, loosening the line somewhat, in order to save the protective tariff from complete annihilation.

I believe that the reciprocity proposition with Canada, if adopted, would not seriously change conditions in this country. I think the Canadian wheat would pass through our mills on the way to the Liverpool market.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask a question here? Can not that same wheat pass through the mills now on the way to the markets of the outside world? Can it not go in bond through the United States now as well as it could under a reciprocity agreement; and if it could, then why should we need a reciprocity agreement in order that the wheat may reach Liverpool?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I would like to hear the Senator from Montana, but I am a little afraid I will be suspected of filibustering. However, disclaiming that, I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the trade, in a way, with Canada is not unequal or unjust or unfair competition in the sense in which free trade with the world would be. The verdict of last November can not well be ignored. The people of the country determined to have a relaxation of the protective policy. This is but a slight concession to that sentiment. I would prefer making this concession to accepting what the Senator's party will give us as the product of the deliberations that are to proceed at the other end of the Capitol during the session of Congress which will meet, according to popular report, about the 4th day of next April.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana confirms me in the opinion which I expressed, and that is that these gentlemen do not expect any substantial result from the Canadian trade agreement, and then they intend to tell the people that free trade or freer trade will not reduce the cost of living.

The Senator from Montana, however, is mistaken when he says their labor is about the same as ours, and when he says their lands are about the same as ours, because if he will go and ask those Americans why it was they left this country and went to Canada they will tell him it was for the cheaper land with greater fertility, producing double as much as our American wheat-growing lands.

I am not advocating protection for anybody. I want the duty taken off of what the people eat and not from what the mills eat. The Senator knows that they take the duty off of barley and leave it on malt, and malt is used to make the poor man's beverage. The Senator from Montana does not deny that. The Senator from Montana will not deny it. This inequality and this injustice runs all through this trade agreement, which I may take occasion to analyze fully before the session is over, perhaps.

I beg the pardon of those in charge of this bill for having digressed from a discussion of profits to be disclosed by the books over to the Canadian trade agreement. I hope now that, without being supposed to desire to delay this matter, because when I said I was through filibustering I meant it, the Senator in charge of this bill will let the Senate adjourn. It is 12 o'clock. We must be back at 11 to-morrow, and my opinion is we will make no progress to-night, although I am through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas to strike out section 5.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], and vote "nay."

Mr. PERCY (when Mr. FRAZIER's name was called). I was requested to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER] is paired on this vote with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. PAGE. My colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. If the Senator from Kentucky were permitted to vote he would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to inquire if the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will withhold my vote and announce that I would vote "yea" if he were present. I also desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is unavoidably detained, and is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I also announce a pair between the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DIXON (after having voted in the negative). I remember that I was paired with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—25.

Dixon	Newlands	Stephenson

So Mr. BAILEY's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendments to be proposed the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I suggest to Senators on the other side, and particularly to the Senator from Indiana in charge of the bill, that we now take an adjournment. Then those of us on this side who are opposed to the bill will have an opportunity to have some conference to see whether it is possible for us to come to some agreement. It is useless to stay here all night.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether by coming to an agreement he would suggest that we could perhaps fix a time for voting on the measure, if we adjourn now and take it up in the morning, or whether some amendments are in question?

Mr. STONE. I do not quite understand the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. My query was, whether the Senator from Missouri had in mind offering any amendments to the measure or whether his suggestion was that we could fix a time for voting on the bill?

Mr. STONE. I do not know, Mr. President, at this moment of any amendments that are to be proposed. I have not heard of any. I presume that if any agreement should be made it would be with reference to some time for disposing of this measure. I say that because I do not suppose that the Senator from Indiana and those who are acting with him would consider any agreement that did not fix some time for the vote. I can not give any assurance, I have no right to give any assurance, that any agreement will be made, and I am not asking an adjournment upon the basis that it can be made; but I do not think any progress can be made toward an agreement by continuing an indefinite session. Nothing can be accomplished in that way—I give assurance of that much—and if it is desired to do anything with this bill, we had better go home, sleep awhile, get breakfast, and come back in better humor than we would be if we were compelled to go on with this bill to-night.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that we take a vote upon the bill and pending amendments at 6 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will object to any agreement of that kind to-night.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator agree for an early vote on Friday?

Mr. STONE. I will not make any agreement to-night for a vote.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator——

Mr. STONE. It might be that some arrangement of that kind could be made after consultation, but I have no right to make any agreement. I am not authorized to do it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that probably in the morning, when we are all fresh and have had a night's rest, we might get together, as we did on another question, and settle it. I do not believe in agreeing to anything to-night.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That was at 8 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. OVERMAN. If we adjourn now we might be able to come to some agreement, but I do not think we can do so to-night. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he remembers what took place here the other night, that we had Democrats talk him over, and there was some understanding arrived at, and it might be accomplished again.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But not at this hour.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, if the Senator wants to go on——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not desire the Senator to yield to me. He asked me a question.

Mr. STONE. If I did or did not, I will yield with great pleasure to the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will wait until the Senator is through.

Mr. STONE. Well, I am through, if the Senator desires to have the floor.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I simply want to suggest that it is not likely that an agreement to vote will be gotten under the threat of an all-night session. I am ready to vote now. I do not want a minute's delay, but I do not want to stay here all night, and I do not want to come to any consent agreement under the threat of an all-night session. I do not like that sort of practice. I think the consent ought to be given; I think there ought to be a vote on this measure. I see no object in preventing it and I am ready for a vote, but I am not ready for a consent agreement under a menace that if we do not do it we will be kept here all night.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN. That is all I had to say. I merely want it understood that consent can not be gotten; that I will not consent under threat of an all-night session; but I am ready for a vote, and I think it will be obtained in due time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the only object I had in asking for a consent agreement was that we might thereby hasten the business. Not only that, but I am perfectly willing to let the vote be put off just as long as possible, in order that the bill may go to the other House. It will have to go to conference and be acted upon by the House, but it would not do to let it go beyond Friday morning.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the situation, of course, is perfectly clear to everybody. But two days more and two nights remain—that is all—to pass the appropriation bills that remain to be considered and this measure. It must be patent then, Mr. President, to everybody that you can not put the matter over as would be done at an earlier period in any session. At 12 o'clock on Saturday we stand adjourned under the provisions of the Constitution.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] says that he is ready to vote now and sees no good reason for delay. This is not a new subject. It has been before the Senate for four years, and during that time it has been extensively debated. There is not a Senator on either side of the Chamber, no matter how he looks at this question, who does not understand it. The particular bill before us is not substantially different from the one which has been before us for four years. The question merely is, then, not the discussion of the provisions of this measure as to its wisdom or policy, but the question is whether or not we are going to pass the bill. Delay patently endangers it. As the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has pointed out, not only must we pass the bill within the next few days but we must pass it early enough to enable it to go to the House, because there are amendments to the bill, and that body must pass upon them. Therefore, if we intend to pass it, there is not a moment to be lost. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is very evident we can not pass this bill to-night.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know why.

Mr. OVERMAN. And I think we shall save time by taking a recess or an adjournment and get to work in the morning. Let us get together and talk this matter over among ourselves, because some Senators have gone home and we should like to confer with each other as to what course we should pursue.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the bill was made the unfinished business last night. There was no night session last night. It was perfectly understood by everybody that, when the bill at that late moment in the session was made the unfinished business, it would be pressed, and therefore there was ample opportunity, unobstructed by anything or anybody, for Senators to get together and talk it over. If what they wanted to get together and talk it over about was what plans they were going to adopt with reference to it, there was no occasion for anybody getting together and talking it over so far as the bill itself was concerned. That is all there is to this situation. Senators who want delay, we must conclude, want it for the purpose of defeating the bill. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think there is anybody on this side who has any desire to delay a vote upon this bill; but it is a fact that a number of Senators, not expecting a vote to be taken to-night, have gone home, and I think it is rather unfair of the Senator from Indiana to insist upon a vote under those circumstances to-night. I am quite sure if the Senator in charge of this bill will consent to let it go over until to-morrow that we will have no difficulty whatever in agreeing upon an hour upon which a vote may be taken. I know myself that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], the ranking minority member of the Committee on Finance, has gone home to-night in the expectation that there will be no action upon this measure. I do not think that, in his absence under those circumstances, the Senator from Indiana ought to insist upon a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS (at 12 o'clock and 35 minutes a. m., Thursday, March 2). Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I am paired for the night with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). I am paired for the night with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] and vote. I vote nay.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I inquire if the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Again I announce my pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. If he were present, he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

I also announce again that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is unavoidably detained. He is paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON].

I also am requested to announce a pair between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. DIXON. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PAGE. I again announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and that he is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 3, nays 44, as follows:

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator from Indiana it is evident we will not have a quorum here very long.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We have a quorum now.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that this side can not be driven into an agreement to-night. If the Senator desires me to go on, I will.

I propose to discuss this question as to the cost and as to how much money we are from day to day expending in this Government for getting this information proposed by this bill. We have consular agents in every country in the world sending daily and weekly reports to us.

Not only that, but we have an appropriation bill here pending that appropriates the large sum of $400,000 for a tariff board. We are spending nearly $38,000,000 for consular agents abroad to send in reports on the cost of goods abroad and here—the information we desire. Then we have what are known as the Bureau of Statistics and the Bureau of Labor, which are sending their agents all over this country and all over foreign countries to get this information.

What do we want with another tariff board? This tariff board, if you will read the bill and study its provisions, in section 5, you will see will cost not less than $1,000,000 a year. One million dollars a year for a tariff board, $38,000,000 for consular agents, and then there is $200,000 in the agricultural bill to gather statistics on this subject.

To show you that we have agents abroad who are sending all these statistics to the State Department, which are available to every Senator, to get all the information that is desired in making a tariff bill, I am going to show you that we have got from every country in the world, from our consular agents, all kinds of statistics in regard to the tariff. I do not think the people will stand for all this expenditure of money. We go on and pass bills here year in and year out, day in and day out. We do not ever count the cost. It costs nearly a billion dollars every year to run this Government, and the people are going to be shown how this money is expended. This bill is only to make more officeholders. We are adding fifty or seventy-five thousand officeholders every year, and now it is proposed to add about 10,000 more, because it will take at least 10,000 men to get up the information that this bill provides for.

Now, let us see. It was stated by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and stated upon this floor by other Senators, when it was charged on this side of the House that our manufactured goods were sold abroad cheaper than they were in this country, that foreign goods, too, were sold in this country cheaper than they were abroad. We charged that they were selling sewing machines in Europe for $19, and that the poor sewing woman in this country has to pay $56. It was not denied, because we had the proof—the sworn testimony. It was shown that a certain class of harvesters and binders were sold in Canada, just across the line, for $90, which sold in this country for $125; and you could not buy them for any less, because every dealer who sold them had a contract with the Harvester Trust to sell them for $125. In other words, an American citizen had to pay for that farming implement $35 more than his neighbor just a mile away had to pay, and his neighbor lived in a foreign country.

The plow that was sold in Europe for $8 was sold in this country for $12. They paid the freight on the harvesters. Indeed, I saw in a magazine of this country a picture of harvesters and binders cutting wheat in Asia with implements that sold there, with the freight paid, and delivered there, for $90, which our people here were paying $150 for. When those facts were shown, I believe it was the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] who rose and said that the reason for that was that our people wanted to get rid of their surplus products in order to give employment to labor, and in order to give employment to labor they had to sell them abroad cheaper, and he then alleged that goods manufactured abroad, too, were sold cheaper here upon the same idea—to give employment to labor they would accumulate a surplus and that they could afford to sell them cheaper in this country than they did at home.

The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] wanted to be fair about this. I think he thought that was the truth; he had been so informed. So he introduced a resolution in Congress asking that the Secretary of State ascertain from our consular agents abroad the truth or falsity of the facts that goods manufactured abroad were sold cheaper in this country than they were sold in the foreign country, the place of manufacture.

That document is here, and I know that since that document has been printed and laid upon the desk of Members that charge has not been made, for we have reports from consular agents from every country abroad, giving the statistics showing that is not the truth. Let us see how that is:

Senate Document No. 16, Sixty-first Congress, first session.
Selling foreign manufactured goods in United States at prices lower than the domestic prices.
Letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting, with accompanying papers, in response to Senate resolutions of March 6 and April 5, 1909, information concerning the practice of selling foreign manufactured goods in this country at prices lower than the domestic prices.

This is such a valuable document and there is so much information in it that I should like to have the Senate present. I do not like to speak to empty seats, and therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beveridge	Chamberlain	Heyburn	Penrose
Borah	Clapp	Jones	Piles
Bourne	Clark, Wyo.	Kean	Root
Bradley	Crane	La Follette	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Crawford	Lodge	Smith, S. C.
Briggs	Cummins	Lorimer	Smoot
Bristow	Dick	McCumber	Thornton
Brown	Dixon	Nelson	Warner
Burkett	Flint	Newlands	Warren
Burnham	Foster	Nixon	Wetmore
Burrows	Gamble	Oliver	Young
Burton	Gronna	Overman
Carter	Guggenheim	Page

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I was proceeding to say that I am opposed to all this extravagance, making more office holders, spending millions and millions and millions of dollars, and duplicating offices. That is what we are doing. If you would investigate these departments of the Government you would find a hundred duplications in the different departments. We have got these consular agents, I say, costing us $38,000,000, sending the very same information here that it costs a couple of millions in another department to get. We have those consular reports weekly and monthly. We have the reports of the Bureau of Statistics weekly and monthly, publishing practically the same thing, piling up, piling up statistics on these very subjects, and here we come in now and ask for a tariff commission that is going to cost us at least $500,000, because this board over here costs $400,000, and they are given extensive power to send all sort of agents abroad, to Europe, and to sit down with consular agents and drink wine, and see the country at $15 a day and $10 a day salary, and when they get the information and send it back here, what is it worth? You will have no more valuable information than you have to-day right here in the office of the Secretary of State and the Bureau of Statistics.

If these consular agents can not give us all this information, let us send somebody there who will. I know myself, Mr. President, of an agent who has been sent abroad at $10 a day salary and $10 expenses, who has traveled all around the world, visiting every country in the world. He has sent information back here—valuable information it is—and we have it. What do you want with any more? He is a tariff expert, too, and one of the best tariff experts in this country.

After getting this information and coming back, what did we do with it? There is now a tariff board in this city that is costing us $200,000 a year, and the first thing we do when they go to work is to send for this young man and give him $4,500 and put him at work on the tariff board here. Here we have appropriated $60,000 in one bill to send more trained agents abroad. That is a very wise provision of law. Two hundred thousand dollars more is provided, I think, in the bill passed this evening to send agents abroad, in addition to the $38,000,000 appropriated for these consular agents.

I say you can go up here in this document room and you will find tons and tons of documents. Sometimes you have the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers come in here with a report, and when you read the report you see that they ask for the destruction of hundreds and hundreds of tons of valuable information furnished on the question of the tariff that no man ever read or ever intends to read. It is destroyed year in and year out. Still the money goes into the pockets of the men to employ these agents and the taxpayers have to pay for it. I doubt if there is a man in the Senate who has ever read this document [exhibiting]. I doubt if there is a Senator who has ever read it. Every morning we find documents laid on our desks that it costs the Government thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars to print. No mortal man ever reads them. They go into the files up here, and reports come in year in and year out from the same old Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers and Documents, and they are sold for old paper.

Mr. SMOOT. And every Senator is asking for the printing of them.

Mr. OVERMAN. And every Senator is asking for the printing of them. That is the truth; it happens here every morning. It costs the Printing Office here millions and millions of dollars every year. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are spent in the duplication of work. Take the State Department, with their agents going abroad, taking a trip to Europe and around the world, paid $10 a day and $15 expenses; the Treasury Department, with hundreds and hundreds of agents sent abroad on a trip to Europe, $10 a day and $15 expenses; the Department of Commerce and Labor, hundreds of officeholders. I heard a Republican Senator here make a speech, and he said if these officers would start up Pennsylvania Avenue, they would make an army of men greater than Grant's army in the grand march after the war that marched up Pennsylvania Avenue. He was appointed on a committee here to investigate the matter, and he described it as equal to the army of Gen. Grant marching up Pennsylvania Avenue.

We do not know how many men we have, how many useless men and how many useless documents. We have all the information that can be gathered on the tariff. As to the consular reports, sometimes when they come we can not read them, and when we ask for a translation we can not get it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to his colleague?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have been recently a member of the committee having in charge the destruction of useless documents, and I know what an exceedingly important subject this is. My colleague is now making a speech that I think ought to be heard by every Member of the Senate. Looking around at the empty benches, I feel like there is a necessity of getting a quorum of the Senate here to hear his very illuminating remarks upon this exceedingly important subject. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beveridge	Burton	Gamble	Page
Borah	Carter	Gronna	Penrose
Bourne	Chamberlain	Heyburn	Piles
Bradley	Clapp	Jones	Root
Brandegee	Clark, Wyo.	Kean	Smith, Mich.
Briggs	Crane	La Follette	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Crawford	Lodge	Smoot
Brown	Cummins	Lorimer	Warner
Burkett	Dick	Newlands	Warren
Burnham	Dixon	Nixon	Wetmore
Burrows	Flint	Owen	Young

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the demand of the Senator from Utah, the Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate adjourn.

The Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. OVERMAN responded to his name when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators are present. There is no quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Indiana?

It is manifest that we will not make any rapid progress, at least, by continuing to-night. I have said already that if there was an adjournment to give us time to rest so that we could get up before noon and get our breakfast, it is more than probable, I believe it is altogether probable, that to-morrow we can come to some satisfactory agreement between the parties with reference to this matter. Of course, I am not in any position to have anything to say that anything can be done and I will not say it. I would not want the Senator from Indiana or any other Senator to come to me and say that I had made a promise I was not keeping, and I will not make a promise that I can not keep and know I can not. I do not make any promise that I can not keep absolutely.

But I think it may be more than likely we can reach a conclusion to-morrow that will be satisfactory. I hope so; and I ask the Senator from Indiana, in charge of the bill, to consent now to an adjournment. This is the last time I am going to make the request. I am doing it for the physical comfort of all concerned. Of course, if it is denied, all that we can do is to go on without any effort on my part to come to any conclusion to-night about anything. I am not saying that in any spirit——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. While the Senator has the floor, I understand the Senator to say that in his judgment and from his knowledge of those associated with him in his views on this question, he believes that if we should not continue to-night an agreement can be reached to-morrow morning to vote on the bill. I understand perfectly the Senator does not put that in the form of a promise; it is his belief that that can be done.

Mr. STONE. I believe that after conferring among ourselves and then having some conferences with Senators upon the other side an agreement can be arrived at. That is my view about it now, but——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator said in private conversation with me a moment ago—and I repeat it merely because it is substantially what the Senator is saying now, except the time—it was his confident belief that if we did not continue the consideration of this matter to-night an agreement could be reached to vote upon the measure early Thursday, or at the latest early Friday morning. If that is the Senator's understanding, I think it clears my mind.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is, of course, using his own language. What I have said I say on the floor, that I think if an opportunity is given for conferences among our friends here, this side and that, an understanding can be arrived at.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Now, what I say is that I am expressing my individual views upon the proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no doubt that is the view of the few Senators on this side who are here. What others who are not here are going to say about it I do not know. Of course, the Senator from Missouri can not be bound by that.

Mr. STONE. I can not be, and I do not intend to put myself in the attitude of being bound by it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Indiana understood that.

Mr. STONE. I do not know what can be done, but I do say that there is a far better opportunity of accomplishing the end the Senator from Indiana has in view—that is, a vote on this bill on Thursday afternoon or Friday morning—by this arrangement than by the course of coercion.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator must modify that term.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to say—and this I say with a good deal of feeling and conscience—that whatever the discomforts may be to Senators on either side, we shall debate the question—we can do it and are prepared to do it as long as we feel we desire to do it. Therefore it is better to give the opportunity for this conference in the hope and belief that an arrangement can be made.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, my friend's last suggestion was, I am sure he will see on reflection, unnecessary. Everybody takes it for granted that the Senator can always debate; and of course the Senator does not mean to use the word "coercion," because that is not in anybody's mind, as the Senator well knows.

The Senator has given us his views, for which I have very great respect, as he very well knows. I observed that the Senator from North Carolina spoke to him, and then wanted to take the floor himself.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wanted to have a thorough understanding. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to have an agreement in the morning. I know what the Senator says, but I do not know what somebody else may say. I do not know——

Mr. WARREN. I desire that Senators should address the Chair. We should like to hear what they say.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said I did not want to give his views or those of any other Senator on this floor. I can only say what we have said and done among ourselves. For some Senator at home and in bed asleep I can not speak. We only say what we think about it, and we give our own views in the matter.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the opinion of the Senator's colleague coincide with the opinion of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned, I would have no disposition to participate in any filibustering tactics upon this measure, and I would be perfectly willing to fix a time to vote. So far as my whispered conversation with the Senator from Missouri is concerned, I will say to the Senator that my suggestion was that we would probably be able at a conference in the morning to come to some agreement about it, but that I did not think it would be wise to unqualifiedly promise or to hold out any false hopes about it until we had had an opportunity to confer.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator, then, thinks as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and his colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] think, that it is likely——

Mr. SIMMONS. I think if we are given an opportunity to have a conference in the morning that the probabilities are that we will be able to come to a satisfactory agreement; but I do not think that we are in a position to promise absolutely that we will be able to do so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, upon the assurance as stated by the three Senators, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting that motion the Chair will suggest that, if there be no objection, the proceedings under the call of the Senate will be vacated. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, let us have the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I notice that on the roll call he is apparently absent, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. DIXON (after having voted in the negative). I forgot that I have a pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. PAGE. I again announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted under a misapprehension. I thought that the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], with whom I am paired, was present. I see he is not, and therefore I will withdraw my vote.

The result was announced; and there were—yeas 25, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bankhead	Cummins	Root	Thornton
Beveridge	Gore	Shively	Watson
Briggs	Heyburn	Simmons	Wetmore

Mr. WARREN (after having voted in the affirmative). I overlooked the fact for the moment that I was paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], and, although I believe he would vote on the same side of this question as I have voted, I will withdraw my vote and preserve the pair.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes a. m. Thursday, March 2, 1911) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, March 2, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1911.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

A similar House bill, H. R. 32908, on the House Calendar was, by unanimous consent, ordered to lie on the table.

EDWIN M. HACKER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also lays before the House the bill (S. 10476) for the relief of Passed Asst. Paymaster Edwin M. Hacker, which the Clerk will read, a similar House bill being on the calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore Passed Asst. Paymaster Edwin M. Hacker, United States Navy, to a place on the list of pay officers of the Navy, next after Passed Asst. Paymaster Thom Williamson, jr., United States Navy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I oppose the passage of this bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, a bill similar to this one has been unanimously reported from the House Committee on Naval Affairs. It has been recommended by the excellent Assistant Secretary of the Navy. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not object to its passage. It is in every way a meritorious proposition. The bill is one in which I am not personally interested; it is really not of interest to my constituents, being an inherited proposition left to me by my late colleague, Mr. Brownlow. It is a measure in which he was very deeply concerned. Paymaster Hacker is a competent, worthy, and deserving official. He has been unfairly treated, unintentionally, and I appeal to the Members of this House to support this just bill.

In order that the merits of this bill may be fully understood I ask that the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 10476) for the relief of Passed Asst. Paymaster Edwin M. Hacker, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass, with the following amendments:

At the end of line 7 change comma to period.

Strike out lines 8 to 12, inclusive.

The bill as amended has the approval of the Navy Department, as will appear by the following communication:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
Washington, February 10, 1911.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to your letter dated January 27, 1911, transmitting a bill (S. 10476) "for the relief of Passed Asst. Paymaster Edwin M. Hacker," and requesting the department's opinion thereon, I have the honor to inform you as follows:

The act of March 3, 1903 (32 Stat., 1197), authorized the appointment of "26 additional passed assistant and assistant paymasters, in all 96," and for reasons which seemed controlling at that time to the department, this entire increase was placed in the lower of those two grades.

On January 1, 1908, Passed Asst. Paymaster Edwin M. Hacker, United States Navy, then an assistant paymaster, stood No. 3 in his grade.

Early in that year the department considered the matter of the promotion of the pay officers in the lower grades, and, being uncertain as to the proper construction of the law, asked for an opinion of the Attorney General upon the question, which opinion was rendered on February 19, 1908 (26 Op. A. G., 511), and of which the following is the syllabus:

"The number of passed assistant and assistant paymasters in the Navy to be appointed in each of the two grades under the act of March 3, 1903 (32 Stat., 1197), not being prescribed by that act, is necessarily left to Executive discretion, to be controlled by the general terms and regulations providing for the advancement of officers in the naval service.

"Nor is it required that the relative proportion of officers in each of those two grades shall remain always the same, a change in the proportion being within the discretion of the Executive, unless controlled by general laws or regulations."

In accordance with this opinion the department, on February 21, 1908, issued the following memorandum:

"It is directed that hereafter assistant paymasters shall be considered due for promotion to be passed assistant paymasters as soon as they have served three years in the grade of assistant paymaster: Provided, That the number of passed assistant paymasters shall not exceed 56."

As a result of this direction some 30 assistant paymasters were examined for promotion, one of whom was Mr. Hacker, who failed professionally, and, in accordance with law, was suspended from promotion for one year. It thus happened that about 28 of his juniors advanced above him, and it is from this excessive loss of numbers that the bill aims to give relief.

Subsequently, Mr. Hacker made application to the department for such action as might be necessary to restore to him the loss of numbers. This application was most favorably indorsed by the Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and Mr. Hacker's record being otherwise excellent, the department replied in part as follows:

"You are informed that under the circumstances, and after careful consideration, the department decides that as the average rate of promotion of assistant paymasters during the five years from 1902 to 1907, inclusive, was approximately seven numbers a year, there is no objection to your obtaining relief to that extent."

While the law relating to loss of numbers resulting from suspension from promotion should be applied impartially, yet its rigors may be relaxed in meritorious cases where there is an abnormal loss of files not contemplated by the law.

The normal operation of the statute indicates the legislative view as to the penalty for professional failure upon examination for promotion—that is, one year's suspension with corresponding loss of numbers and difference of pay—and this should not be modified in individual cases, nor in any case where any of the attendant circumstances render the officer unworthy.

Had Mr. Hacker been examined at practically any other time and failed professionally, he would have suffered a normal loss of numbers (found to be about seven), but owing to special and extraordinary circumstances hereinbefore outlined he lost four times that many.

Inasmuch, however, as Mr. Hacker was suspended from promotion for one year, by which, it is true, he lost an abnormal number of files, yet he did not actually lose any more pay than would have been the case under normal conditions. All but seven of the lost files the bill now proposes to restore to him, but with no loss of pay at all, though under any year's suspension there is always a corresponding loss of difference of pay. It is therefore recommended that the following modifications be made in the bill:

Line 7, at end of line, change comma to period.

Lines 8 to 12, inclusive, strike out.

As thus modified the department has no objection to the measure.

Faithfully, yours, BEEKMAN WINTHROP,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield a little time to me?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this bill is similar in terms to H. R. 30940. It appears from the report that Mr. Hacker, passed assistant paymaster, was examined and failed to pass professionally in the examination that is required by the Navy Department for promotion.

During the intervening year that he was obliged, under the rules of the Navy Department, to await another examination 28 of Mr. Hacker's juniors were advanced in the service. This bill contemplates restoring Mr. Hacker to a grade above those who passed successfully. I can not see wherein there is any merit in singling out for promotion a man who failed in the examination when he had his chance and who, after having failed, asks to be given preference over those who passed the examination.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is that seriously proposed?

Mr. STAFFORD. This is the purpose and effect of the bill.

We had a similar matter up before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, where some lieutenants in the Revenue-Cutter Service had failed to pass the examination for promotion, and were obliged to remain in the lower grade for a year, and during that intervening year many were promoted in the regular course to the higher numbers. It was proposed to bring those lieutenants back several numbers to the standing near to that they might have had if they had passed successfully.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What reason is there why this extraordinary thing should be done?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no reason whatsoever advanced, except that during this intervening year a great number of men happen to be promoted to the higher grade, more than the usual number. I do not believe it is fair to the men who have passed successfully; who have taken the examination, and who have met the conditions.

If the gentleman can advance any reason why this man, who, in the examination, failed to meet the requirements of the service, I may withdraw my objection; but there is no excuse whatsoever advanced for his failure to pass the professional examination, and I ask why this man should be singled out and placed above these 28 others who were promoted during that year, and given something that he does not deserve, because he did not keep up with the requirements of the service. If I had not examined this bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, I would not have raised this objection. My objection to the bill is based on principle, and I am opposing it as I have opposed similar bills. It is not right that we should single out for promotion a man who has failed in his examination.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that this bill proposes to leave the man seven numbers lower down on the list, which is the normal loss under such circumstances?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. There is a similar bill pending before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

Mr. MANN. If there is such a bill before our committee, I have never heard of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was a case where certain men desired to be placed in a standing that they did not deserve.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken in saying that there is any similar bill before our committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is a similar bill, that has been called to the attention of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Division!

The House again divided; and there were 101 ayes and 29 noes.

So the bill was passed.

ORGANIZED MILITIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 28436) to further increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, and for other purposes, a third reading of which was ordered yesterday and was laid over because of a demand for the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the demand for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The bill was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HAY. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STAFFORD and Mr. MANN made the point of order that no quorum was present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently no quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 159, nays 125, answered "present" 12, not voting 88, as follows:

PANAMA CANAL BONDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 10456) to restrain the Secretary of the Treasury from receiving bonds issued to provide money for the building of the Panama Canal as security for the issue of circulating notes to national banks, and for other purposes, a similar House bill (H. R. 32218) being on the calendar.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to insert in the bonds to be issued by him under section 39 of an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, a provision that such bonds shall not be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issue of circulating notes to national banks; and the bonds containing such provision shall not be receivable for that purpose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to raise the question of consideration on this bill, and pending that I want to see if I can make an arrangement with the gentleman from New York about the debate on the bill, if the question of consideration is not raised.

Mr. PAYNE. What does the gentleman desire in reference to debate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think there ought to be an hour on a side.

Mr. PAYNE. It is pretty late in the session for that, but it is a very important bill. I suppose if the gentleman raises the question of consideration it might take half an hour to vote. I have thought of an hour for both sides. Will the gentleman compromise on an hour and a half?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There are a great many requests on this side for time. Gentlemen would like to be heard.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate proceed for two hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and one-half by myself, and at the end of that time the previous question to be considered as ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Subject to amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all debate on this bill shall be closed in two hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York and one-half by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill for final passage.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On the bill and amendments. I do not think there will be any.

Mr. PAYNE. I modify the request to that extent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, at the time we were formulating the present tariff law there had been issued bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal in the amount of $87,309,594.83 and that money had been turned in to pay toward the construction of the canal. There has been expended in the construction of the canal up to this date $229,430,929.45, leaving a balance expended out of the general fund of the Treasury, and reimbursable from the sale of bonds, of $140,000,000 and upward. We put a clause in the tariff act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds bearing a rate of interest not exceeding 3 per cent to provide funds for the entire construction of the Panama Canal as then estimated, to wit, $375,200,950. There have been issued to this date $84,000,000, leaving a balance of bonds authorized and not yet issued of $290,569,000. The construction so far of the canal has been paid out of the general funds of the Treasury, and although in the last three or four years we have been running pretty close on the balance of general funds in the Treasury, still the Treasury Department has been able to pay for this construction up to date. But, Mr. Speaker, the time is coming, and is not far off, when we would have to issue bonds to reimburse the Treasury for a portion of this expenditure. The deficit from the 1st of July up to the present date, by the Treasury report of this morning, is $4,975,038.36. This is on the basis of the ordinary expenses of the Government, but we have already expended this year for canal purposes $25,334,587.38, so that the total deficit for this year, including Panama expenditures, is $30,309,625.21. It is hoped that this deficit may be decreased between now and the 30th of June; but, on the other hand, we have to look in the face of the fact of some extraordinary expenditures which the Treasury may be called upon to pay.

In the first place, we have actions pending against the Treasury for the tax on corporations on which we have collected in round numbers $27,000,000. Of course, as gentlemen all know, that case is pending in the Supreme Court, but we can not always tell with certainty what the court may decide. As for myself, I have always believed that the tax was constitutional. Other gentlemen of the House, better lawyers than I am, believe that it is not, but if the court decides against us that $27,000,000 must be paid and can only be paid out of the issue of bonds, because we are authorized to reimburse the Treasury for the expenditures for the canal, and, of course, that reimbursement, if necessary, will go into the general fund for the expenditures of the Treasury Department.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; for just a question.

Mr. MADDEN. I desire to ask this question for information. Does the gentleman from New York know how much has been paid out of the Treasury that has not been reimbursed from any source in the matter of the canal construction?

Mr. PAYNE. The balance over and above the bonds that have been issued is one hundred and forty-two million one hundred and twenty-one thousand and odd dollars. We are entitled to issue bonds to the amount to-day to place the amount in the Treasury now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will indulge me on this immediate point I will then yield for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thought the gentleman would yield as he has yielded once. Is the gentleman of opinion that taking from these bonds the right to secure circulation——

Mr. PAYNE. I will come to that; of course I can not speak about everything at once. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I can get back to the point from which my attention was diverted, if the Supreme Court should decide this tax case against us, we would also lose $25,000,000 the Treasury estimated for the tax to be collected for this fiscal year. Adding that to the $27,000,000 already collected, which we would have to reimburse, would make a further deficit of $52,000,000. Then we can not ignore the fact that the pension bill, which we have passed, and which is now in the Senate, and which may or may not become a law before the 4th day of this present month, calls all the way from the lowest estimate to perhaps not the highest, of from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000.

So that an issue of bonds is imminent. Then, there is the question of the ordinary receipts and disbursements. Every gentleman knows that under any revenue bill the receipts are largely affected by the business of the country. What the business of the country may be for the present year that we have now entered upon no man can say. We have had two quite prosperous years, and an immense revenue under the present law. Whether there will be a curtailment of that revenue or not, of course, is only in the future, but it would be a calamity if some legislation were not passed by which we could at any time replenish the Treasury for these overdrafts which may come upon us.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the clause of the tariff act which authorized these bonds, as in the other bonding acts, no reference was made as to whether the bonds should or should not be used as security for the issue of currency notes of the national banks, and therefore they come under the banking act which provides that any bonds of the United States may be so used as security for the redemption of these national-bank notes.

Outside of these bonds authorized, the only method by which the funds in the Treasury can be replenished would be by borrowing money on certificates which the Treasury is authorized to issue and which is provided for in this same tariff act, to run not in excess of one year, and to draw interest at the rate of not exceeding 3 per cent. These certificates might be issued in an emergency, but it is quite plain, if the emergency arises and the bonds or certificates are issued, we shall not want to redeem any part of them within a year after the issue. Congress has settled on the policy that the expense of this canal is to be paid for out of bonds, to be paid for by the future generations that will enjoy more the benefit of the canal than the present generation. And so it would seem that the last thing to be resorted to would be the $200,000,000 of Treasury certificates authorized by the act. The provision for these certificates was made a part of the permanent law of the country, so that in any case where the receipts run below the expenditures it will be possible to borrow for a short length of time money to be paid within the year. It is not desirable to issue them for the funding of the canal debt. They were not meant for that purpose. We provided bonds for that purpose, to become due in the future and to be paid in the future.

Mr. Speaker, the security for national-bank notes, of course, has been 2 per cent bonds issued by the United States—not because the investors of money in the country desired generally to lend money to the Government at 2 per cent—that did not pay; the credit of the Treasury was not sufficient to justify the loaning of money to the Government at 2 per cent. But, coupled with that, we have this provision of the national banking law which virtually compelled the banks when they took out circulation to take these 2 per cent bonds, and, with the half of 1 per cent tax upon their circulation, to take what little there was in it, and they could not get the circulation unless they bought the bonds. These bonds have been bought by them at par, or a little beyond—at 102, generally. Of the 2 per cent bonds that have been issued the great bulk of them are held by the national banks. Seven hundred and thirty million dollars of them have been carried by the banks for circulation, but they have reached the limit where they want these bonds for circulation, and no more circulation is desired. Not even the emergency circulation proposed in the previous bill has been desired by the banks since that bill passed, and here are these $730,000,000 of bonds held by the banks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in addition to that the banks hold a block of these bonds which they have deposited with the Treasury Department as security for the deposits of the national funds. The banks have the bonds yet, but we have run so low that we have no money to deposit as security for these bonds. Of course there is a prejudice against banks and always will be, and yet the banks are represented by stockholders, and stockholders are human beings, and some of those human stockholders, or, at least, I suppose a good many of them, are sitting in this House to-day, and they know something about their human feelings toward banks and bank stock. These people have been forced by their Government to buy these bonds and pay above par for them, and pay more than they were really worth, for security of the banks' circulation, and they were led into supposing that they were going to get some deposits of the United States funds, and they bought more of these bonds, which they now hold. The bonds held by individuals are only a small amount in the whole. I will not undertake to say from memory how much.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. In just a moment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Right at that point.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, right at that point.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from New York imagine that the national banks were innocently misled into making a bad investment?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Or does he think they were forced to make a bad investment?

Mr. PAYNE. They were forced to make a bad investment or else go without circulation. Whether that is misleading or not I leave to the gentleman's conscience.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why were they forced?

Mr. PAYNE. Because they could not get along without it. They had to put up bonds. These were the only ones they could do it with.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Were they forced to do that when other bonds were outstanding at the same premium?

Mr. DOUGLAS. They did not need to take out circulation if they did not think it was profitable.

Mr. PAYNE. They were not forced? What a proposition! We had to have banks; we had to have currency; we had to have money; and the only way it could be given to them was by putting up these bonds. You may call it force, or you may call it patriotism on the part of the banks to furnish currency. However it was, they were squeezed between the upper and the nether millstones, and they did not suppose that the United States would ever do anything to disparage those bonds and send them to a discount.

They supposed that the United States in the issue of bonds would make some regulation by which the new bonds would give no better privilege to the other national banks coming in than they had themselves, or force the rate of premium up so high that they could not afford to take them. In any event, in any way you put it, the result is the same. If it were merely a pocketing of the loss by somebody, and that were all there was of the question, it would be different. But the Government of the United States ought to be as honest and scrupulous in its transactions as the most scrupulous of its citizenship.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. And when a private individual forces a loan from another and then goes to work to impair the value of that loan, he creates an equity against himself.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest right there that by reason of the refunding of the 2 per cent bonds the Government made a net saving in interest charges of over $17,000,000?

Mr. PAYNE. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman know that if they did not refund them they would not have paid any interest at all?

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I understood the gentleman to say that of these bonds the banks bought a certain quantity with the idea of issuing circulation upon them as the basis of circulation, and that they were induced to do so through the belief that the Government would make deposits in their banks.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is getting two things mixed up. It is true that a portion of the bonds were bought for circulation, and a portion were bought for security of deposits. The large bulk were bought for circulation.

Mr. HARDY. "For security of deposits," the gentleman says. I understand the gentleman said that in that hope they were misled. Now, did not the bankers know as much about the possibilities of Government bonds as anybody in this country? How could they have been misled?

Mr. PAYNE. They might have known that and still would not know that the Government funds would be entirely withdrawn.

Mr. HARDY. How could they be misled by any act of the Government?

Mr. PAYNE. They did not know how much money would be expended by the Government. You and I did not know it. Nobody knew it. Nobody could know it. Nobody knew how much money would be raised by taxation.

Mr. HARDY. They knew the condition of the Treasury and the laws under which they were expected to get these deposits.

Mr. PAYNE. They knew Congress might change the taxing law any day. If there was a man in the United States who knew what the expenses of the Government would be under the appropriations made by Congress he was wiser than any man who ever sat on this floor and wiser than any banker that ever lived.

Mr. HARDY. One more question and then I will be through. Did not the bankers, in taking that risk, take the ordinary risk of a purchaser?

Mr. HILL. No; they were forced to take 25 per cent.

Mr. PAYNE. Why, the ordinary risk of a purchaser from the Government of the United States, believing that the United States would do the honorable thing by them.

Mr. HARDY. The United States Government in no way pledged itself to deposit anything with these banks.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman said he only wanted to ask one question. I think he will have to stop. He is using all my time.

Mr. HARDY. Very well.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask half a question? They were confined to United States bonds to secure deposits——

Mr. PAYNE. I do not yield to the gentleman. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 23 minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. PAYNE. After I have yielded to others, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, the strictly domestic affairs of this Government are of surpassing importance to its citizens but lack the novelty and picturesqueness of certain newer and, in the judgment of some of us, at least, less worthy policies.

Our colonial experiments command the interest of all thoughtful citizens, however much they may be deprecated. What we are doing in the Philippines, what we have done and especially what we may hereafter do in those islands is a matter of absorbing interest.

Never for an instant since the first armed American set foot on those far-away Asiatic islands have I approved of the enterprise. I can not view it in any other light than as a disaster to the people of the United States, the unjustified assumption of enormous expense, and the abandonment of our holiest political tenets.

I wish very much that in the study of this problem one could find more pleasing chapters. It is not a story in which Americans can take pride. The recent investigation under the so-called Martin resolution disclosed a shameful but not unexpected condition of affairs.

Our government in the Philippines is a carpetbag government, and seems to have all the characteristics of government of that sort. In fact government of any people by aliens from the days of Roman proconsuls down through Clive and Hastings, the very best and ablest of the tribe, to that unmatched horde of rascals who ruled and robbed the people of the South after our great Civil War has not varied greatly.

Now and then there has been an honest governor, an unselfish, altruistic, confiding sort of man. I have in mind such a one now. But they have been few, and the subordinates have not all been like the occasionally honest chief.

Our government in the Philippines has probably not been as bad as carpetbag government in Roman colonies, in the Indies, or in the Southern States, but in the main it has been no credit to us. Like the carpetbaggers who have gone before, our Philippine administrators have, as the evidence adduced in the recent investigation plainly shows, displayed conspicuous zeal in their own interest.

That modern device known as State credit, evidenced by bonds and other securities, has been used to enhance the value of choice town sites and pieces of farm lands that provident carpetbaggers had selected for themselves. Railways and highways have been built by public funds, and strangely enough have led to the lands previously acquired by these trustees of the Philippine people. It may be a mere coincidence, this juxtaposition of American-owned property and these publicly built roads, but knowing something of the tribe of carpetbaggers I have my doubts.

That in the Philippines we have simply followed the usual rule of the conqueror and plundered the subject nation, doing this despite all protestations of disinterestedness, has been demonstrated this very winter before the Insular Committee of this House. The Insular Committee acted under resolutions limited in character, but allowing it to investigate as to whether sales and leases of public lands had been made in the Philippines in violation of law. If its investigation had extended to the whole subject of the American action in the Philippines, it is to be feared that a much more disgraceful condition of affairs would have been developed. As it is, considering, as the committee did, only certain phases of the land question, the results were bad enough.

Great aid in the examination of the record of affairs before the committee has been furnished by the brief presented by Jackson H. Ralston, Frederick L. Siddons, and William E.

Richardson, attorneys for the Anti-Imperialist League, and who followed the course of the investigations with the greatest possible care. I find from examination of their brief that they have demonstrated certain legal propositions with, as I believe, absolute clearness. These propositions, in brief, are as follows:

(1) By the terms of the act creating the existing Philippine Government no American citizen or citizen of any country, save of the Philippine Islands, was empowered to buy a foot of public lands in the Philippine Islands, while only Filipinos could obtain them by virtue of occupation and cultivation, extending over a period of five years, and then only in tracts not exceeding to an individual 40 acres in extent, and to a corporation 2,500 acres. The citizens of the islands to whom such sales of lands were permitted are defined by the act to be—

All inhabitants of the Philippine Islands continuing to reside therein who were Spanish subjects on the 11th day of April, 1899, and then resided in said islands and their children born subsequent thereto * * * except such as shall have elected to preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain.

(2) It is next shown by the brief that the so-called friar lands of the Philippines, which were purchased under the authority of the act of July 1, 1902, creating the Government of the islands, were subject to the same restrictions as were the public lands—that is, they might only be sold to citizens of the islands and in tracts of the size I have mentioned, and subject to like conditions.

Despite the conditions of law above shown to exist in the Philippine Islands, it appeared in the investigation that direct violations of law of the following descriptions had taken place:

(1) The commission had valued and sold to its own members tracts of public lands. This without any conditions as to occupation or cultivation, the members purchasing being citizens of the United States and not citizens of the Philippine Islands.

(2) The commission, in like defiance of the plain letter of the statute, had sold to corporations (not Filipino, but American) tracts of public land as large in three several cases as 2,500 acres in extent; this in like defiance of law.

(3) The commission, without any authorization of Congress to pass such an act, had provided by its public-land laws for the lease in tracts as large as 2,500 acres of public lands to American citizens for a term of from 25 to 50 years and at a minimum and usual rental of 10 cents gold per acre. Under this violation of law the commission had permitted to be leased to the nephew of the member approving the lease a tract of 2,500 acres for a period of 25 years, renewable for a like period, at $250 gold per annum.

(4) The commission had permitted the sale to its own executive secretary of 4,200 acres of land near the city of Manila, this land to be paid for in the course of 20 years, the annual payments being met directly from the labor of Filipino tenants.

(5) The commission had sold tracts of friar lands, the largest being a body of 55,000 acres, to persons closely identified with the American Sugar Trust, the purpose of the purchase being to erect a large mill and, incidentally, to control in a great measure the sugar business of the Philippine Islands.

The nature of the offenses committed by the members of the commission and their subordinates is more fully set out in the brief to which I have referred, such brief stating succinctly the facts proven before the committee and making a most damning total. I print extracts from the brief:

TRANSACTIONS AT BAGUIO.

Shortly after the acquisition of the Philippine Islands it was considered that it would be necessary to establish a health resort in the mountains of the island of Luzon, and Baguio, about 160 miles from Manila, was chosen as the place for its establishment. By Executive order of October 10, 1903, Camp John Hay was established as a military reservation at this point. On December 21, 1900 (act No. 61), the Philippine Commission appropriated $75,000 in gold to construct a road from Pazorubio to Baguio. On November 11, 1901 (act No. 297), the Philippine Commission appropriated ₱11,000 for the purchase of lands and buildings at Baguio for the insular and provincial governments.

On December 31, 1904, the commission, on the recommendation of Secretary of the Interior Worcester, resolved to establish a town site at Baguio. By its act, No. 636, it had created a Government reservation pending the establishment of a town site.

On May 29, 1903 (act No. 767), $1,500, local currency, was appropriated for work on Government buildings. On June 30, 1903 (act No. 794), a survey was ordered for a road from Naguilian to Baguio, to cost $2,500, and a survey directed of the town site; and for location of pumping stations and reservoir $5,000 was appropriated.

By resolution of the commission, dated April 30, 1904, the expenditure of $3,500 was ordered for improvements at Baguio, and by further resolution (Annual Report 4, 1904, p. 519) ₱880 were appropriated for a pesthouse at that point. On May 26, 1906 (act No. 1495), the Burnham plans for the town at Baguio were adopted.

By act of August 18, 1906 (act No. 1527), the resolutions of the commission of May, June, and July, 1906, directing the proceeds of land sales at Baguio to be used in or near the town site for public improvements, and expended by the superintendent of the Benguet Road, on approval of the secretary of commerce and police (now Gov. Gen. Forbes), were confirmed.

On December 22, 1906 (act No. 1508), ₱30,000 were appropriated for the Governor General's residence and ₱5,000 for a building for the employees of the bureau of public works.

On June 27, 1907 (act No. 1662), ₱5,000 were appropriated for the construction of the hospital building at Baguio. On August 17, 1907, ₱8,250 were appropriated for buildings for the bureau of agriculture and ₱20,000 for the improvement of the Baguio town site.

On October 2, 1907 (act No. 1735), grant of a railway concession for the railway to Baguio was ordered.

On May 29, 1908 (act No. 1837 of the Philippine Legislature), ₱11,000 were appropriated for additions to Benguet Sanitarium. On June 15, 1909 (act No. 1957) the commission, as governing non-Christian tribes, passed an act governing local improvements in Baguio and referring to a resolution of March 30, 1907, as amended, which resolution is not found reported in the appropriate volume.

On June 26, 1909 (act No. 1957), the Philippine Commission, acting under its authority as above, amended the act last recited, and on the same day, by act No. 1959, provided for rules governing the Benguet toll road.

The above recital is believed complete according to data at hand, but apparently does not cover all appropriations.

Under the public-land act, passed by the Philippine Commission, a commission was appointed to value the lands of the town site in Baguio. This commission acted under the direction and with the approval of Secretary of the Interior Worcester. The lands having been thus valued, Secretary Worcester, on May 28, 1906, bought at the appraised value about 10 acres of ground, which he had, as he says was known, long desired to buy and which he considered the best building site in Baguio, although, as is evident from the report of sales at this point and a consideration of all the circumstances, not land of the highest appraised value.

With this résumé of facts in mind, let us consider the law and the proprieties of the situation, discussing some matters heretofore not under examination.

It seems to us of the highest importance to call attention to certain rules of the common law, and one or two embodiments of the rule in statutory law, which seem to offer a touchstone to determine whether the actions of Government officials in the Philippines in the cases to be enumerated were consistent or inconsistent with the principles of sound business morality.

It is a principle of law so well known as to need no citation, save it were to convince persons as ignorant of fundamentals as seem to have been the leading officials of the United States in the Philippine Islands, that a person occupying a trust relation can not deal in the property with relation to which he is a trustee, and can gain no profit out of or from such dealings if he so far transgress as to deal in it.

The soundness of this rule was recognized by its embodiment in statutory law in section 452 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which reads as follows:

"The officers, clerks, and employees in the General Land Office are prohibited from directly or indirectly purchasing or becoming interested in the purchase of any of the public land; and any person who violates this section shall forthwith be removed from his office."

In the case of Lavagnino v. Uhlig (26 Utah, 1) it was said, in substance, that it was the intention of Congress to prohibit, on the ground of public policy, the officers, clerks, and employees in the General Land Office from acquiring, directly or indirectly, through a purchase from the Government, any of the public lands of the United States, and that the foregoing section applied as well to the mineral as to the other lands.

In re Frazin and Oppenheim the circuit court of appeals of the United States for the second circuit said (vol. 181, Fed. Rep., p. 307):

"It is a long-established principle of equity jurisprudence that a trustee can not become a purchaser of the trust estate. And not only trustees, strictly speaking, but agents, attorneys, and all persons acting in behalf of other persons and obtaining confidential information concerning their affairs can not purchase their property, except under certain restraints not necessary to be considered here."

In this case the appraiser himself had undertaken to purchase, and the court, among other things, said:

"We are fully satisfied from the record that the appraiser was negotiating with respect to the purchase of the property before he signed the appraisals. Upon these facts, we are of the opinion that the appraiser, Hoerle, was as a matter of law incapable of purchasing the property in question at the trustee's sale."

Having, therefore, laid down the general principles, which, in our judgment, control, or should control, the disposition of lands in the Philippines to public functionaries, let us consider the actions of Philippine officials with regard to Baguio lands, beginning first with those who are highest in office.

THE CASE OF GOV. GEN. FORBES.

The present governor general of the Philippine Islands is W. Cameron Forbes, who became such governor in the year 1909, having been appointed vice governor on July 1, 1908, previous to which time he was secretary of commerce and police.

Gov. Forbes purchased at Baguio, on May 28, 1906, two tracts of land (p. 464), aggregating 64,600.03 square meters, or, as nearly as may be, 15 acres, of ground. For this he paid 1,293 pesos, or approximately 86 pesos per acre; in gold about $43. It is a fair assumption from the evidence that this was the appraised value, and this assumption is borne out by the testimony of Secretary Worcester (p. 693). The appraised value was fixed by an assessment committee, whose actions were subject to the approval of Mr. Worcester. To the extent, therefore, of 15 acres of land, in what was designed to be the summer capital of the Philippines, Mr. Forbes became the purchaser of a tract of land which, according to Secretary Worcester (p. 696), he, Forbes, considers the best site in Baguio.

Since the time of his purchase Mr. Forbes has become Governor General, and there has been erected for his use as Governor General, at the expense of the Philippine Government, a mansion costing nearly, or quite, 30,000 pesos, so that apparently the land he purchased is now held for investment or speculation. From the time of his purchase up to his appointment as Governor or Vice Governor, Forbes was secretary of commerce and police, and under his jurisdiction came the bureau of public works. This bureau had and has charge of the expenditure of public moneys at Baguio and under it a large amount of money, only in part, as we believe, ascertainable from a careful perusal of the reports of the commission, has been expended for the improvement and development of Baguio. For instance, an automobile road has been constructed, public buildings have been erected, a sanitarium has been established, drives of an extensive character have been made, and expenditures aggregating hundreds of thousands of dollars, the effect of which has been to increase the value of lands in Baguio, have been made or provided for, many of these expenditures antedating the time of purchase, and many occurring subsequently.

No thought of the impropriety of his conduct seems to have entered the head of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands.

THE CASE OF DEAN C. WORCESTER.

For many years, in fact, nearly or quite from the beginning, Dean C. Worcester has been secretary of the interior of the Philippine Islands. The land laws, with all their incongruities, with their defiance in spirit and in text of the statute of the United States forming the Philippine Government, have been framed or supervised by him.

Mr. Worcester controlled the board making the appraisements upon the land at Baguio. He knew in advance of the establishment of the new town, the tract he desired for himself. As he says (p. 696), "It was known for fully five years that I intended to bid for the lot, which I afterwards occupied." His appraisers, therefore, whose actions he confirmed, must have known the same thing. He, like Mr. Forbes, considered that he had the best site. He purchased, on May 28, 1906, the date of the purchase of Mr. Forbes, 39,676.97 square meters of land, paying therefor 595.15 pesos. In other words, for approximately 10 acres he paid 60 pesos per acre, or $30 in gold, in the summer capital of the Philippines, upon the approach to which hundreds of thousands of dollars had been expended, and hundreds of thousands of dollars, as stated, had or have been since then paid out for public buildings and public improvements under the direction of the Philippine Commission, consisting of himself and his immediate official and personal associates. As if this were not sufficient defiance of all rules of official propriety, on the same day that the personal purchase was made by Mr. Worcester there was sold to the Baguio Country Club, of which Mr. Worcester is president, 345,473.97 square meters for the sum of 2,303.20 pesos, being approximately 82 acres at the rate of 28 pesos per acre, or in gold $14.

A pretense is made in the testimony of Capt. Sleeper that Secretary Worcester purchased at public auction. It is manifest from the surrounding circumstances, as well as Secretary Worcester's own testimony, that this is not so and that if he had no one would have had the temerity to bid against him had he so purchased.

Mr. Worcester (p. 577) complains bitterly of the libelous statement about himself, which he cites, and which charges a desire to possess for his essential personal benefit properties registered under the names of others. It appears to the contrary in this instance; Mr. Worcester frankly and openly, and with the utmost insouciance, violated in his own person the canons of business and professional ethics to which we have alluded, his moral and business sense not being sufficiently acute to enable him to know when he was violating the proprieties due to his position.

It is not to be wondered at that many of the American officials followed the example of Forbes and Worcester and purchased at Baguio large tracts of land of great potential value.

Let us pass now to other cases.

EXECUTIVE SECRETARY FRANK CARPENTER.

"Like master, like man." We next come to consider a case of patent wrongdoing on the part of Mr. Worcester, secretary of the interior; Capt. Sleeper, director of public lands; and Mr. Carpenter, executive secretary.

Mr. Carpenter became fired with the ambition to make money in the Philippines, an ambition fostered and furthered by Capt. Sleeper and sanctioned and approved by his superior officers. There existed an estate, at its nearest point 8 miles from the boundaries of Manila, having upon parts of it over a thousand people, and adjoining another estate lying between it and Manila, upon which there were over 2,000. This estate, called Tala, was for the most part unoccupied, and Mr. Carpenter determined to acquire such portion.

The roads to the estate were in bad condition. Mr. Carpenter's associates therefore promised him, if he would take it, they would be placed in good condition, and the Government has expended upon such roads and approaches approximately, as nearly as the testimony shows, as much money as Mr. Carpenter was to pay for the estate he finally took, or agreed to take.

The conditions in the neighborhood as to order were not good. The facile Government agreed to furnish all police protection needed.

The people in the neighborhood were not rich, and stood in need, as it was believed, of money with which to purchase carabao and other things needful for its successful cultivation. Thereupon the loan fund for that purpose, which had not theretofore been intended to affect the Tala estate, was extended to it within a few months after Carpenter's contract was made.

The congressional act permitted a leasing of friar lands for three years, the Tala estate being of this character. The Government, looking with peculiar favor upon one of its pets, undertook to change the laws so that Mr. Carpenter might not only lease, but on easy terms become the owner in fee simple.

Under these circumstances Mr. Carpenter agreed to lease, with the right to purchase, upon a change of the laws. The laws were changed so far as the commission could do so, the conditions as to protection and road and bridge building were met, and Mr. Carpenter is now on the highway to become the owner of 1,694 hectares of productive land, at its nearest point, as stated, within a short distance of Manila, and approximately 4 miles from the railway station of Polo, running north from that city.

The conditions of terms of payment deserve special attention. We find on page 106 of the report of the Governor General and others that the average price per acre was ₱7.48, which would make the sale price of the whole tract ₱31,677. This is to be paid at the rate of one-twentieth per annum for 20 years, a credit being allowed Carpenter for the amount he may have paid under his leases. The average per acre per year, therefore, to be paid on account of the purchase price approximates 37½ centavos (18¾ cents) per acre plus 4 per cent interest on the deferred purchase money.

It appears from Mr. Carpenter's testimony that he does not expect himself to pay any portion of this sum, but to make the same out of his tenants. This is certainly the meaning of his answer to the question on page 472:

"Q. Do you expect the returns from your tenants to meet your payments for the land, this without any material advance by you?—A. I do not expect the returns from my tenants—i. e., any share in the crop which may pertain to me, to meet my payments for the land during the lease period—i. e., three years. I do expect that beginning with the fourth year the product of my tree plantations, the increase of my cattle, and my share of crops raised by tenants will meet the annual payments on the lands which I should purchase under the terms of my contract with the Government and the expenses generally of the plantation as a whole. However, I shall not be surprised if, during the first and second years of the purchase period—i. e., the fourth and fifth years of occupancy—I have a deficit to meet from my salary."

The net result, therefore, of this proceeding is that through the kindness of the Philippine Government in all the particulars we have enumerated, a kindness which does not appear to have been extended to another person in the land, American or Filipino, Mr. Carpenter at the end of 20 years will find himself in the possession of a property originally valued at about ₱32,000, paid for by the labor of his Filipino tenants, increased in value by the expenditures of the public money, liberally promised and liberally made by the government of the island, and, so far as he is concerned, he will have furthered the creation of a landlord and tenant system in the Philippine Islands, turning the Filipino from being a possible landowner into that of a contributor to the wealth of a member of an alien race. All this is done under the guise of tender consideration for the welfare of the Filipinos.

Like Gov. Forbes, like Secretary Worcester, it seems never to have occurred to Mr. Carpenter that in speculating in the natural wealth of the Philippine Islands, he was dealing in property as to which he was an administrator, and not a proprietor in his own right. A haunting fear of public comment upon this transaction seems, nevertheless, to have possessed the Philippine officials, for never till June 10, 1910, was an official report made to Congress on the subject, while with the utmost deliberation, Capt Sleeper twice over in his report for the year ending June 30, 1909 (H. Doc. 914, 61st Cong., 2d sess.), speaks of the intention to place the Tala estate on sale, although he had, when he wrote the lines, contracted to sell the remainder of the estate to Carpenter.

CAPT. SLEEPER, DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Capt. Sleeper, so far as his testimony and the records in the case show, has confined his operations to investments in mining prospects or mines. In this respect he would, in the United States, under the decision in the Utah case, above referred to, have fallen under the condemnation of the statute. In the Philippines his actions escape statutory condemnation and receive the praise of his superiors in office. He made, as director of public lands, the arrangements with Mr. Carpenter containing the pledges as to police protection, road and bridge building, and additional legislation, and his promises have all been redeemed at the expense of the Philippine people.

J. R. WILSON, ASSISTANT DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The position of Mr. Wilson seems to us as flagrant as that of any of his associates. He has applied to lease nearly 2,500 acres of land in the island of Mindanao for 25 years, renewable for a similar period. This application, while not formally granted, has never been rejected. For this he apparently will pay 50 centavos a hectare. He has taken possession of the lands, planted them in coconuts and so long as official action upon his application is delayed, and until the lease is formally issued, he will not be under obligation to pay rent. In the absence of Capt. Sleeper, he would be called upon to approve his own application, and would literally lease to himself. It is presumable that his superior officer would not care to disapprove an application of such sort presented by his immediate inferior, and it is also presumable that it will not be acted upon as long as Mr. Wilson can, by nonaction, avoid the payment of rent. Meanwhile Mr. Wilson is enjoying the reception of an annual salary of ₱7,500 per year, paid by those for whom he is trustee, and whose trust he has abused.

The example of the present Governor General and of the secretary of the interior, purchasers of land at Baguio, was not thrown away upon Mr. Wilson, and on the same day that they did he purchased in that town a tract of land approximating an acre and a half in extent, for which he paid ₱60.39, or at the rate of about ₱40 per acre, or $20. He also purchased, on April 15, 1908, about an acre and a quarter of land, paying at the rate of approximately ₱180, or $90, an acre. The deeds presumably were made by the Governor General, who was empowered to execute deeds of public lands.

OTHER INSTANCES OF PURCHASE BY PUBLIC OFFICIALS.

The worthy example set by Government chiefs in the Philippine Islands was, as we have seen, not lost upon their immediate subordinates, and the virus extended all through the service. We will cite only a few illustrations. Mr. Z. K. Miller, machinery expert of the bureau of agriculture, applied for 350 acres of land (p. 460), which application is still in full force and effect. The solicitor general, George Harvey, paid ₱10,000 a year by the Filipinos, appears as the president (p. 461) of the Siasi Plantation & Building Co., applying for a lease of 2,500 acres of land. A very large number of employees appear as purchasers of tracts at Baguio.

LEASES TO THE WORCESTERS.

Mr. E. L. Worcester, nephew of the Philippine secretary of the interior, seeking new bulbs wherewith to glorify Easter, went to the islands. Not unlike the unlucky man in the poem who in sinking a well for water missed it, but struck a gold mine, Nephew Worcester failed to find satisfactory flowers, but did find a glorious opportunity to gain a fortune. In the rich lands of the Province of Nueva Ecija he discovered a tract of nearly 2,500 acres so level that by making little embankments the water in the rainy season could be retained long enough to produce rice. For this land he applied, and with no difficulty the Government leased it to him at the lowest rental permitted by a law apparently framed by the secretary of the interior. Thus the nephew of the secretary of the interior has been given an apparent right to possess for a period of from 25 to 50 years nearly 4 square miles of land, paying therefor for the first period the lowest possible rental of 50 centavos a hectare, or 10 cents in gold per acre, or a sum total of less than $250 in gold per annum for its exclusive enjoyment free of taxes.

That the public land law and the administration thereof presented violations of the letter and spirit of the act of Congress is manifest on little consideration.

Without any restriction as to cultivation such as was required by law in the case of the sale of public lands, (a) this land has, through long time lease, been conveyed (b) to an American and (c) in a quantity exceeding by 60 times that which even a Filipino would take in fee.

It is idle for men situated as were those of the Philippine Commission to suggest that while Congress has limited the sale of public lands to Filipinos and on terms of occupancy, it has given to the commission a general power to lease without restriction. It was the duty of the commission to know the spirit and intent of the act, which expressly declared (sec. 12) that the lands were to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants, specifying what lands citizens could take and what lands Americans. As trustees, the commission was charged with a sacred duty. It was neither becoming nor decent to seek a way of escape from the purpose of the act because its framers did not at every moment reiterate their manifest purpose.

It is unfortunate for the reputation of Secretary Worcester that up to this time the largest beneficiary more than seven times over by the actual reception of a lease of public land consequent upon this perversion of congressional intent has been his nephew. It is also unfortunate for him that one of the largest prospective beneficiaries to the extent of 500 hectares should be his brother, George S. Worcester (p. 205), whose application for lands in the same immediate neighborhood stands unrejected. It thus appears, besides the holdings of public lands by Secretary Worcester, in clear violation of express statute, his immediate family now controls practically 6 square miles of Philippine farming lands, which were to have been administered by him for the benefit of the inhabitants (meaning citizens of the islands).

OTHER PUBLIC-LAND SALES TO INDIVIDUALS OR CORPORATIONS.

It would be useless and unnecessary to multiply indefinitely as we might instances of dispositions of public lands to private individuals or corporations, in violation of the letter and spirit of the law, but we can not refrain from giving some special attention to those to California corporations.

Certain peculiarly well-informed sugar interests in this country, evidently in a position to read the future with marvelous accuracy, determined, far in advance of congressional action as to the admission of sugar from the islands, to invest largely in Philippine lands aside from the purchase of friar lands hereafter to be discussed, and these interests thought it advisable to purchase public lands. Though Congress had, as we have stated, limited possible sales to Filipino citizens and corporations, the commission, with lofty disregard of a legislative body 11,000 miles away, had made a law unto itself permitting sales to American corporations, and thus it came to pass that when the San Mateo Agricultural Co., the San Carlos Agricultural Co., and the San Francisco Agricultural Co., all California corporations, presented themselves, through E. L. Poole, the common agent of the American sugar interests, he was heartily welcomed, taken on a Government steamer to Mindoro, shown the fatness of the land, and given patents for his principals. Thus it was that 7,500 acres of Philippine public lands, their heritage, as the Filipinos vainly thought, passed into the possession of a small group of Americans who will give Filipinos leave to toil for aliens on the lands of their fathers. This land, capable of supporting, as Filipino farms go, near 2,000 people, is made the patrimony of a few persons, foreign to the workers. Can we understand why the Filipinos do not love us?

FRIAR-LAND TRANSACTIONS.

We come to discuss as we shall only briefly, notwithstanding their real importance, because they have been so fully elucidated by Mr. Martin, the friar land transactions.

We have in the earlier portion of this brief pointed out the fact that it was the intent of Congress that the limitations as to sales of these lands were the same as pertained to public lands—that is, that they might only be sold to citizens of the islands under special conditions as to occupancy, and then only to private persons (citizens of the islands) in tracts not exceeding 40 acres in extent and to corporations not exceeding 2,500 acres. We allude, in passing, to the fact that the Insular Bureau had pointed out to Mr. Hammond, the original attorney of the sugar interests, the futility of restrictions upon the extent of holdings in the island of Porto Rico, with a tacit intimation that the restrictions in the Philippines might be no stronger. (H. Doc. 957, 61st Cong., 2d sess., p. 72.) (Maj. Frank McIntyre, Acting Chief of the Insular Bureau, on September 4, 1909, in writing to Mr. John Henry Hammond, after quoting section 3 of the act of May 1, 1900, relating to Porto Rico, and restricting the holdings of agricultural corporations to 500 acres, said: "It seems to me that we would make a mistake, now that this question is about to arise seriously in the Philippine Islands, to wholly neglect the precedents that may have been established in the construction of this act in Porto Rico. Maj. Shelton, one of the officers of the bureau, was in Porto Rico about the time of the passage of the recent tariff bill, and I cabled him to look up this feature of the matter in Porto Rico, and when he returns, which will be in a few days, he may have this specific information. However, it is very generally known that, notwithstanding the very restrictive nature of the section above referred to, the sugar industry in Porto Rico has been developed as fully as though there were no such provision.")

Let us, then, enumerate the large parcels of land which have passed or are about to pass under the control of the American sugar interests.

San Jose estate.—In the island of Mindoro is a tract of friar lands, about 55,000 acres in extent, which the Philippine Government has contracted to sell, and in large part has sold, to E. L. Poole, as representing H. O. Havemeyer, Charles J. Welsh, and Charles H. Senff, all of whom for years have been engaged in sugar growing or refining in the United States, Cuba, and the Hawaiian Islands. These gentlemen, as stated, long before others appreciated the fact, realized that Congress would so act as to sugar from the Philippines that its production there would be specially profitable and adaptable lands advance in value. Thus an agent, J. Montgomery Strong, was first sent out and looked over certain tracts, making known the object of his visit to some of the Government officials. Thereafter and on his return one E. L. Poole, experienced in the sugar business in Cuba, was made agent for the syndicate and sent to the Philippines with authority to act. Meanwhile the three associates had entered into a sort of partnership agreement, contemplating the immediate raising of $40,000 and thereafter as much as might be necessary for the purchase of 25,000 acres of Philippine sugar lands, the erection of a mill, etc. Pursuant to this agreement the Mindoro Development Co. was formed under the laws of the State of New Jersey, its capital first fixed at $100,000 and afterwards raised to $1,000,000, and the purchase of the San Jose estate took place.

On November 23, 1909, Director of Public Lands Sleeper, with the approval of Secretary of the Interior Worcester (p. 251), entered into a contract with E. L. Poole to convey to him or his nominees 22,484 hectares, 81 acres, and 50 centares of land (the San Jose estate) for the sum of ₱634,000, or $317,000, ₱42,875 being payable January 4, 1910, and the balance in 19 equal annual installments of ₱36,375, deferred purchase money to bear 4 per cent interest. Some later divisions took place, part of the land being conveyed to the Mindoro Development Co. and the balance became transferable to E. L. Poole, his corporate or individual nominees.

Steps have been taken to cultivate sugar and to build extensive mills, to be operated for the benefit of the owners of these lands and of the tracts of 7,500 acres before spoken of deeded to California corporations. Meanwhile, except as finally patented, and little has been or will be for 19 years, no taxes are paid on the land.

The effect of this transaction upon the ultimate welfare of the Filipinos we will consider later.

The Isabela tract.—Mr. E. B. Bruce, of Manila, whose firm represents the principal American exploiting interests in the Philippines, represented the Havemeyer syndicate in the San José transaction and on his own behalf and for others, including his law partner (p. 265), deemed the opportunity of obtaining landed wealth in the Philippines too good to be lost. Accordingly, we find (p. 218) that on January 6, 1910, he entered into a contract of lease for one year, with right of purchase, of 19,448 hectares, 35 ares, and 44 centares (approximately 49,000 acres) of the Isabela tract. For this, if he completes his purchase, he will pay 422,500 pesos, or $211,250, in 20 installments, with 4 per cent interest on deferred payments. For the lease for one year he pays $100, promising the Government, should he not take the lands, to give it the benefit of an agricultural investigation he proposed to make. This investigation has shown the land to be valuable for sugar growing.

Differing from nearly all other leases, Bruce has an unrestricted right of assignment without governmental consent.

The Calamba and Biñan tracts.—Shortly after the above transactions there appeared at Manila A. F. Thayer, who professed to represent, and doubtless in certain respects, if not in all, did represent the Dillinghams, extensive sugar growers of the Hawaiian Islands, and there was leased to him on April 2, 1910, over 1,000 acres of the Calamba estate for the term of six months and for the sum of 487.33 pesos. We find, however, that A. F. Thayer is the lessee (p. 197) of a total of 614 hectares, 24 ares, 32 centares of the Biñan estate and a total of 3,287 hectares, 57 ares, and 55 centares of the Calamba estate. He acquired control, therefore, over approximately 10,000 acres of valuable lands.

We shall not attempt to follow other purchases by or leases to Americans of friar lands, as those furnished are sufficient for illustration, and we have already discussed the Carpenter purchase. Their evils we have commented upon, and we shall recur to them.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS AS TO THE LAND POLICY OF THE COMMISSION.

It is probable that wrongdoers are rarely unable to justify to themselves their own wrongdoing. In this instance we find that the sale or lease of Filipino land in great quantities to exploiters is justified under plea of the highest welfare of the Filipino, their more steady employment, their enhanced wages.

Even so did Jacob undoubtedly justify his purchase from Esau of his birthright for a mess of pottage, for by so doing did he not give Esau a new lease of life? Has not many a moral slave dealer justified the reduction of his captive to submission by pointing out that but for his intervention the slave would not have been taught the ways of industry and shown the truths of his owner's religion?

It is not a far cry from the position of Jacob or of the slave dealer to that of Secretary Worcester and his fellows of the Philippine Commission. Let us review some of the facts and see.

Ostensibly to benefit the Filipino, to give him employment and raise his wages, the commission, as we believe we have shown, violated the law in the sale to sugar magnates of 55,000 acres of friar lands. The purchasers intend, first, to establish a sugar mill of large capacity and grind all the cane to be produced on this tract and other tracts of 7,500 additional acres. Next they seek to put to work, for a while at least, as many Filipinos as will work for them. Then they propose to sell off or lease to these or other Filipinos the lands they work, and grind their cane for them.

After the Filipinos shall have bought or leased in small farms, and at such prices as the syndicate may fix, the lands in question, the mill will grind their cane, and will be able to charge for such service a price which will leave to the Filipino his bare subsistence. The poor farmer will be at its mercy, for there will be no competitor for the purchase of the cane. A perfect working illustration of the operations of the modern "trust" will thus be supplied, and a thousand Filipinos will make "bricks without straw" for strange masters. The plan is well thought out, and save for unexpected obstacles, not to originate with the commission, will meet with success.

That success is to be expected will be apparent from a consideration of the circumstances. In the island of Negros are Filipino farmers making a fair and independent living, though only with their crude mills extracting 50 to 60 per cent of the saccharine matter. These can not compete with farmers in Mindoro from whose cane will be extracted 90 to 95 per cent. They must either immediately retrogress in the social scale or move to Mindoro. Accepting the latter alternative, they become first laborers for the sugar syndicate and next landowners or lessees in a small way, surrendering all their earnings, save a bare pittance, to the Mindoro Development Co. Their birthright will have been sold to-day for a mess of pottage, and to-morrow they will go hungry.

Let us conceive what an opportunity the commission in its blindness has thrown away. If instead of spending the money of the people in Baguio improving the property of its members, building a mansion for the governor general, and in other things burthensome to the people, it had started or helped to start sugar mills in Negros or Cebu or southern Luzon where charges for grinding would have been under the control of the government, real prosperity and independence would have been the lot of the Filipino farmers and a debt of gratitude would at least have been earned. As it is, the Filipino has seen his patrimony frittered away, as far as opportunity to fritter it away has opened to the commission. Land capable of supporting in comfort and plenty many thousands of toilers has become the possession of a few. The Old World conditions, which have caused millions of people to cross the Atlantic to the United States, are, so far as the humble powers of the commission permit, being reproduced in the Philippines. The ornithologist of Michigan has become a landowner, virtually through sale to himself, the seeker after Easter lilies is the lord of thousands of acres, the executive secretary has and will have hundreds and even thousands of Filipinos contributing through their toil to swell his fortune, the debonair gentlemen of the future American-Philippine sugar trust will command the services of thousands of tenants, the rich sugar lands of the Isabela tract will make more Americans millionaires.

Except as we have indicated we do not attack the "law" honesty of the Philippine officials. While they may not have stolen the goose from off the common, they have permitted the theft of "the common from off the goose." Their intelligent comprehension of their duty to their wards we deny in toto. They have no more idea of true republicanism, of true democracy, than if they had lived 300 years ago. Modern thought means nothing to them. Conservation of resources for future generations they are incapable of understanding.

It is not necessary for us to determine how far their errors and blunders and shortcomings are due to the situation in which they find themselves. We can not forget, however, that they have been petty monarchs among a people for whom their contempt has been little disguised. Filipino public opinion is either ignored or its existence denied, as has repeatedly been done before this committee. Their attitude is that of the aristocrat toward the plebe, the master toward the serf. Too ignorant to know they should not speculate in things as to which they were trustees, they have had the effrontery to judge as to what was good for a people over whom an unkind Providence has placed them.

THE WORCESTER LIBEL SUIT.

Our review of the record, necessarily brief considering the importance of its subject, would be incomplete without express reference to an instance of tactlessness and official indiscretion, which, were further proof necessary, demonstrates the utter unfitness of Secretary Worcester for the delicate and well-nigh impossible task set before him—that of governing, in defiance of all American ideas of home rule and self-government, an alien race—an instance which shows that, however good a zoologist a man may be, he may lack an intelligent comprehension of the human race.

The judges of the Philippine Islands (save those of the supreme court) are named by the Governor General with the advice and consent of the commission. Such judges hold office during the pleasure of the commission. (Act No. 136.)

Secretary Worcester (p. 577), conceiving himself libeled by a publication in El Renacimiento, induced or permitted the public prosecutor to bring a criminal libel case against the supposed authors, under which they were sentenced to six, six, and eight months in the penitentiary. Not content with this, and perhaps like John Gilpin, possessing a frugal mind, he brought a suit for damages, which, in the Philippines, like the criminal case, was tried without a jury, and recovered a judgment of ₱60,000, or $30,000.

The man who would seek to recover damages for injured reputation before a judge whom he helped to create, and can help to destroy, when such judge must himself determine the measure of recovery without the intervention of a jury, is not such a man as can safely control the liberties of a people.

CONCLUSION.

We have finished our review, incomplete as of necessity it must be, but developing the most salient points. What should be done?

Many of the most prominent American officials in the Philippine Islands have demonstrated such intellectual unfitness and moral obtuseness that they should be summarily removed.

The Philippine Government, without authority, has caused deeds and leases of public and friar lands to be executed to American citizens and corporations. The Attorney General should be empowered to take appropriate methods to have these instruments set aside.

It should be made a criminal offense for Philippine officials, directly or indirectly, to purchase or lease the lands of the Philippines.

Such further legislation should be had as will absolutely prevent American exploitation of the Philippines so long as we exercise jurisdiction over them.

While we have enumerated those things which seem most immediately pressing, we should not for an instant be unconscious of the infinite egotism of Americans in assuming that they, who as yet are but learning to govern themselves, are competent to rule a people of another language, customs, traditions, ideals, and mode of thought. Rather than continue to display our necessary incompetence, we should permit the Filipinos in their own way, learning by their own mistakes, to develop for themselves that system of government and that civilization which shall prove most nearly in accord with their aspirations.

Under the leave to print granted me by the House I shall also insert an interesting article that recently appeared in the National Monthly:

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE—THE DEMOCRATIC DUTY AND OPPORTUNITY.

(By Erving Winslow, secretary of the Anti-Imperialist League.)

THE DUTY.

If a great party ever inherits a duty, none could be more binding than that which devolves upon the Democratic Party as a sacred obligation—to make a declaration of the purpose of the United States to give independence to the Philippine Islands. In three successive national platforms, which were shaped by the leading men of all schools in the Democratic Party, this doctrine has been enunciated in unmistakable terms. The Democratic national platform of 1900 asserted:

"We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to give to the Filipinos, first, a stable form of government; second, independence; and, third, protection from outside interference, such as has been given for nearly a century to the Republics of Central and South America."

The Democratic platform of 1904 contained this declaration:

"We insist that we ought to do for the Filipinos what we have already done for the Cubans, and it is our duty to make that promise now, and upon suitable guaranties of protection to citizens of our own and other countries resident there at the time of our withdrawal—set the Filipino people upon their feet, free and independent, to work out their own destiny."

And this was the language of the Democratic platform in 1908:

"We condemn the experiment in imperialism as an inexcusable blunder that has involved us in an enormous expense, brought us weakness instead of strength, and laid our Nation open to the charge of abandoning a fundamental doctrine of self-government. We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established, such independence to be guaranteed by us as we guarantee the independence of Cuba, until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers. In recognizing the independence of the Philippines our Government should retain such land as may be necessary for coaling stations and naval bases."

Nothing has arisen to modify or to alter the obligation thus repeatedly and clearly expressed. It is true that in the uprising which has changed Democratic minorities into Democratic majorities no formal appeal concerning this matter has been made to the electorate. But the uprising has been against the elements of centralization, the "new nationalism," and the corrupt and powerful interests, creations of that imperialism, which took its rise from the period of the Spanish War and the establishment of the colonial system. The duty of the Democracy is to destroy the foundations of this corrupting and unnatural growth. It is the "interests," the trusts, and syndicates that are now opposing a promise of independence to the Philippine Islands and which, if they become rooted there, will forever oppose independence.

THE OPPORTUNITY.

The opportunity for fulfilling this duty is a critical one. Year after year Mr. Taft, as Governor General and President, has urged the removal of the tariff barriers between the Philippine Islands and the United States, afterwards to be followed by relaxation of the restrictions limiting the sales of land to individuals and to corporations.

In the first month of his Presidency, Mr. Taft succeeded in effecting the modifications of the tariff between the United States and the Philippines. And last year, with the approval of the Attorney General, he endeavored to have what are called the friar lands, the richest lands in the archipelago, purchased by the United States from the orders, thrown open for unlimited sales to large operators. All the much-vaunted prosperity in the Philippine Islands is connected with this form of stimulation. Concerning it President Schurman, of Cornell, himself one of the early commissioners to the Philippines, writes:

"I was heartily in favor of the policy championed by Senator Hoar and embodied in the act of 1902, limiting the area of sale of lands in the Philippine Islands. In the absence of such limitation the lands would have been sold in large blocks to individuals or corporations, and the Filipinos would have had imposed upon them all the evils of monopolies and trusts from which we are suffering in the United States, without the means of protecting themselves against those evils which we enjoy from the right to choose Representatives and Senators to make and repeal our laws.

"I suppose that the people and Congress of the United States have the power to do anything they like with this Philippine question. But while it is glorious to have a giant's strength, it is tyrannous to use it like a giant. And the subjection of the Filipinos to capitalistic domination, however we may cloak the business in terms of trade and commerce, is oppression and cruelty of the same order as the most despotic empires have ever practiced on subjugated and dependent peoples.

"I hope, therefore, that the Philippine act will be so amended as to bring the lands purchased from the friars under the same restrictions as that act imposed upon the sale of all other lands in the Philippine Islands. If this is not done, and if these friar lands are sold in large areas to individuals or corporations, we shall have officially abandoned the policy of the 'Philippines for the Filipinos,' which we have proclaimed as the established policy of the United States since the islands came under our sovereignty. The Filipinos would feel that we had betrayed a most sacred trust, a trust involving the welfare and economic independence of 7,000,000 people, for whose destiny we have become responsible."

Efforts continuously made ever since Mr. Taft became Governor General of the Philippine Islands are being more persistently pressed than ever under the administration of Gov. Forbes, and are again urged in the report of Secretary Dickinson to open the Philippine Islands in a large way for the investment of capital in exploration, mining, and agriculture. There is no doubt that the islands are rich in many ways hitherto unsuspected and that it would require but little encouragement from the great interests to establish that hold in the Philippine Islands from which the Democratic Party is pledged to deliver the people of the United States. This policy of encouragement has been stated by Mr. Morgan Shuster, formerly of the customs service in the Philippines, when he says, after quoting the belief that the administration favors a long continuance of our sovereignty: "Capital * * * is not in the habit of acting on mere expressions of opinion in matters so vital to its safety * * * I believe that a declaration at the proper time by the Congress of the United States that our sovereignty will not be withdrawn from the islands for a period of at least 50 years * * * would go far to reassure those who are at present deterred by the comparative uncertainty in which the future of the Philippines is veiled." That which predatory wealth desires is, of course, in a general way the exact opposite of what the public good demands. It is the part of Democracy to cause the declaration of Philippine independence to be made that capital may adjust itself accordingly. The occupation of the Philippine lands by absentee owners and their development by the kind of labor which satisfies the owners' demands would absolutely destroy any hopes of independence to the natives or any tenure as possessors of their own soil. This is the result of an administration whose head has repeatedly expressed his belief in a permanent connection of the Philippine Archipelago with the United States, while deceiving himself, perhaps, as well as those who hear him, by promising that in two or three generations the pledge of independence shall be made; meanwhile in every way encouraging the exploitation of the land, which must absolutely confirm the colonial attachment, every foreign capitalist, trust, and syndicate becoming an active lobbyist against any such disturbance of his security as the removal of the United States sovereignty.

The educational system of which we hear so much, and which in its way is a reasonable source of pride, should have gone along with the development of the capacity for ownership and cultivation of the land.

Dr. Barrows, the former superintendent of education in the Philippines, himself says:

"The limitation of land areas to be sold to individuals and corporations, introduced into the organic act of 1902 by the efforts of Senator Hoar, was intended to carry on the excellent economic development of the Philippines under Spanish rule without the investment in productive industry of foreign capital. The Spanish laws for utilizing Spanish lands, forests, and mines were scientifically conceived in the public interests. The Government's first duty was to the small farmer or peasant proprietor, and to the young native merchant and manufacturer.

"The forestry and land bureau had been organized for years and was conducted on scientific lines and produced revenue for the State. The taking up of public lands for agricultural purposes was encouraged, and title given to the actual occupant and settler, but it forbade the possession of landed property by foreign corporations. The unlimited acquisition of mining lands was not permitted, but they were subject to leases or concessions."

While we point to the increase of exports and imports since the removal of the Philippine tariff as an indication of prosperity, what efforts have been made and with what success to build up the prosperity and happiness of the Filipino people? Because the lands have not been rapidly taken up by the Filipinos, Gov. Gen. Forbes now says that it is useless to wait, that it might take several generations to develop the latent resources of the islands without the assistance of outside capital. But the Government has merely published favorable laws, and has taken no pains to acquaint the poorer classes with the opportunity to acquire lands, and has done nothing to encourage its clients by supplying surveyors and land agents to assure the correct location of settlers. The only successful result to which the Secretary of War can point, in his recent report, is the penal colony of Iwahig, where thousands of criminals carry on industrial and agricultural pursuits under an administration largely controlled by themselves—a very striking object lesson of what real Filipino independence might be.

On the other hand, the agricultural bank, which was intended to be of assistance to the peasant proprietor, has been a wretched failure, excuse being made therefor that so many of the titles of applicants were defective, a matter which, with good will, could be easily cured. Out of 565 applications for loans, 453 were refused, so that the total amount loaned has aggregated only $142,225.

Without entering into particulars of the sales of the friar lands, which it has been attempted to exempt from the conditions applying to the other public lands in the Philippine Islands, it is sufficient to summarize that, first, the lands were held by friars; second, the American Government found the money to buy them out; third, the Filipinos pay the interest on this loaned purchase money; fourth, American trusts and companies walk into possession and acquire the benefit thereof.

Those who are the guardians of the common people and who believe that one of the functions of government is the restraint of greedy and selfish capital desire, for the peace and welfare of those who are at present their wards, that the Filipinos should be protected by the certainty that their independence is a fixed and inevitable fact and that the promise of it is not a rainbow, an iridescent dream, to be offered them at some future time when, with the unchecked trend of affairs, the occupants of the islands will be either representatives of foreign or American capitalists, or landless peasants.

The matter of government would arrange itself in case of independence under that protection secured to the Archipelago by neutralization of the powers.

And here let the repeated mendacity be once more refuted that, while the Filipinos want independence, they want American protection at the same time. They want general neutralization under the ægis of that great principle of international law prevailing in Belgium, Switzerland, Luxemburg, and Norway.

The absurdity of the stupid persistence of the statement is beyond belief that the Filipinos are still untrained in the exercise of political rights under a republican form of government. The Secretary of War acknowledges that "there are very many highly educated Filipinos, many men of talent, ability, and brilliancy," perfectly capable, of course, of guiding the destinies of their own people according to their own methods and their own way of understanding and enjoying life. We are not going to turn the Oriental into a Yankee until the crack of doom. We have not quite yet decided ourselves what a "republican form of government" is here in America after our long experience, and the question whether the popular initiative and referendum is consistent therewith is yet to be decided by our courts. There might even be some internal disorders in the evolution of national life in the Philippines. What then? We had a little difficulty, a generation or two ago, which rather puts us out of court as throwers of stones. As Mr. Storey says:

"A formal declaration of independence is the only source of peace and good order. It must be remembered that the speeches and writings of the fathers of the country and of our great statesmen are in the hands of the educated Filipinos, and that they are deeply imbued with the aphorisms of the Declaration of Independence and the principles of our Constitution. Any effort to turn the wheels of progress backward will inevitably lead to disorder. Secretary Dickinson warns his countrymen that 'if the present policy of control of the islands by the American people shall continue,' there will be discontent, and this discontent will increase. A recent writer says, addressing the American people: 'If your policy is against independence, and even against encouraging hopes for it and plans for it, and if you are stubborn enough to persist in that policy after it has been shown to be a mistake, you must expect the natural consequence to follow, namely, frequent dissatisfaction, dislike, and failure. But a change of policy would lead to quite other results.'

"We learn now that the two houses of the Philippine Assembly are in a deadlock because they can not agree upon the choice of the two Resident Commissioners which the Philippine Assembly is authorized to elect and send to the United States. These Commissioners have no power and no vote. They are intended merely to speak for the Filipinos, and for this purpose have seats in the House of Representatives. They are the only channel through which the Filipino people can reach the Congress and people of the United States. The representatives of the Filipinos should surely have the right to select these, but, as a matter of fact, the upper house of the Filipino Legislature, which consists of the Philippine Commission, including the Governor General, controls their choice. The men selected by the United States to govern can dictate who shall speak for the people whom they govern. This can not continue.

"Every American, whether in official station or private life, feels superior to the brown man and consciously or unconsciously shows it. Such an attitude is fatal to any real sympathy between governors and governed, without which no government can hope to succeed. We have no right in the islands, and the longer we stay the wider will be the gulf between the Filipinos and ourselves. The present relation costs both nations dearly, not merely in money, but in character and self-respect. It can not endure, and no financial ties can do more than make the separation more difficult and costly. All the money invested in slaves could not save slavery, and it will be equally powerless in the Philippines when the hour and the man come. To the Democrats, soon to be in power, the Americans and the Filipinos appeal: 'Deliver us from the body of this death.'"

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the proposition before the House is this: We have issued nine hundred and some odd million dollars of 2 per cent bonds that the banks can use for the purpose of issuing bank notes against them for circulation purposes. Of those nine hundred and odd million dollars' worth of bonds that are now outstanding, seven hundred and odd millions are owned by the banks. There are only something like $200,000,000 of bonds that the banks of the country can buy to-day if they want to start new banks or increase their circulation, so that there is very nearly a monopoly of this right.

Last year, when it was demonstrated that we would have a deficit in the Treasury unless we paid the expenses of building the Panama Canal by the issuance of bonds, a law was passed providing for the issuance of $200,000,000 worth of bonds to pay those expenses. That law provided that these bonds should be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, to bear not over 3 per cent interest, and on the same terms, so far as being used for security for national-bank notes, as the 2 per cents were issued.

Now, it is not necessary for the Secretary of the Treasury to sell these bonds as 3 per cent bonds if he does not want to do it. If the condition of the country will warrant it, he can sell them to bear 2 per cent interest, just like the other 2 per cent bonds. I concede the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury does not think he can sell them as 2 per cent bonds, and I am inclined to think he can not, but he has the right to sell them, paying 2 per cent interest, if he desires to do so and if the country will absorb them at that rate. That is the law. There has not been any reason within the last year why the Secretary of the Treasury could not sell the bonds and get the money that he wants to take care of the Government, except that he does not want to sell the bonds that he has been authorized by law to sell. If this bill is defeated, there will be no reason why the Secretary of the Treasury can not sell bonds to make up the deficit in the Treasury, except his own refusal to do so.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. It seems that the purpose of this bill is to prevent these bonds from being used as security for the issuing of circulating notes by national banks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. CULLOP. That is the purpose expressed in the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. CULLOP. What reason is given why bonds issued for the building of the Panama Canal should not be used to secure the circulation of national-bank notes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There was a hearing before the committee, and the reason stated in that hearing was that if we gave these bonds that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell the privilege of being used as security for the issuance of circulating notes by national banks we would depress the price of bonds that we have already issued. That is the reason that they gave.

Mr. CULLOP. How would it depreciate them?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because they say there would be more bonds in the market with that privilege than the market is ready to take up. That is the reason given by gentlemen who want the privilege stricken out.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Is not there another reason—that you can not sell the bonds now at 2 per cent? If you sell the bonds at 3 per cent the national banks, under the privilege attached to those bonds, will throw the twos on the market in order to get the threes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not agree with my friend there.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Is not that what they claim?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, they claim that; but the most of these twos are held by the national banks to-day. I say it would be simply absurd to say that the national banks of this country are going to force on the market a 2 per cent bond which they hold, and against which they can issue money up to its par value, in order to go out and buy a 3 per cent bond at a higher price.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Are any of these bonds now held by banks as a basis of circulation in such condition that if they surrendered the 2 per cents and 3 per cents deposited in their places that they could go to the Treasury and demand payment of the bonds?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all, for none of them are due. But I understand there has been some claim by outside parties, not by the Treasury Department, that there is some moral obligation on the part of the Government to maintain the price of these 2 per cent bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury went before the Ways and Means Committee and disclaimed that proposition.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. When are the 2 per cent bonds due?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are 30-year bonds; they are not due for nearly 30 years to come.

Mr. CULLOP. One more question, if the gentleman will allow me. If this bill should become a law, would not the effect be to diminish the amount of securities for securing the national-bank circulation and therefore have a tendency to decrease the amount of circulating money in the country?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly it would make it more difficult for a new bank to get bonds to issue circulation.

Mr. CULLOP. Would it not also have the effect of increasing the market price of the other bonds on the market?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly, and that is the reason they want this stricken out.

Mr. PICKETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PICKETT. I want to get a correct understanding of the situation. Is it the gentleman's opinion that a permission for the Panama bonds to be used as a basis of circulation will depreciate the 2 per cent bonds?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said I did not think it would seriously depreciate the 2 per cent bonds. The reason is that the twos, or the larger portion of them, to-day are held by the national banks, they having issued money against them to the full face value of the bonds. Now, why should they draw in that circulation and sell the twos or put them on the market? Unless the twos are forced on the market there will be no depreciation below what they are selling for to-day, which is about par.

Mr. PICKETT. There may be some impairment, but not serious, the gentleman thinks?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, there may be some. I think the real situation is this: These 2 per cent bonds some years ago were bought by the banks when the Government was depositing money in the banks. They bought them and got 2 per cent interest, and got the Government money deposited and the amount of the bonds. When they did that it was a profitable undertaking. They bought these bonds in the market at a premium. It was a mere matter of speculation, just as you and I would go out and buy a block of railroad stock. Now, I think they want to prevent the use of these bonds for a circulating medium and thereby ultimately force the twos back to the price they originally paid for them.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. How many of the 2 per cent bonds are now held by the national banks?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that there are $736,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it not true that if the 3 per cent Panama bonds are permitted to be used for circulation in the establishment of more national banks in the country, no 2 per cent bonds will be used at all, but 3 per cent bonds would be at a premium and the 2 per cent bonds would be depreciated?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I think this: I do not hesitate to say that if the Secretary of the Treasury sells these bonds at 3 per cent—and mind you, he can sell them at 2, if somebody will buy them from him——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will it not also depend upon the price that the threes bring?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Threes may be worth so much in the market, and there will be no advantage to the bank to buy threes for circulation any more than twos.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If 3 per cent bonds are put on the market they will sell for more than 2 per cent bonds, of course; but I say this: If there is likely to be any injury done by issuing the 3 per cent bonds there is a remedy for that that would not work an injury to the Government, and that will be to equalize the bonds when used for the purpose of issuing money against them, so that the bonds would stand on a parity, so far as the issuance of national-bank notes is concerned.

Mr. PUJO. As a matter of fact, do not the great stable Governments of Europe issue their obligations for a much higher rate of interest than 2 per cent?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They do.

Mr. PUJO. Is it not true that British consols are quoted as yielding 3.16 per cent, French rentes 3.06, and imperial bonds 3.61?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I do not know the exact figures.

Mr. PUJO. Approximately. Now, does the gentleman believe that the Congress of the United States, after having issued its obligations for approximately $912,000,000 as a basis for its circulation, should subsequently issue these bonds first at 2 per cent and then come in and issue a bond bearing a higher rate of interest, thereby depreciating the obligations which it has made current?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman is through, I will answer the question. I do. I most emphatically do. There is not a municipality or county or city that does not issue its bonds, and then, if its financial exigencies require it to issue more bonds, that does not do so according to the conditions that confront it at the time. There is not a great Government in this world except ours that attempts to maintain the price of Government security. British consols sell up and down the line, according to the demand for them, and there is no reason and it is not good financial policy for the Government of the United States to inject the Treasury Department into the bond markets of the world to sustain the price of these bonds. We should sell the new bonds at 2 if we can do it, and if we can not, we must sell them at the price that Government bonds will bring to-day in the market.

And I say that it is bad financial policy for us to attempt to pass a bill to-day that is intended to depreciate the security we are selling for the benefit of the American people, to appreciate, on the other hand, a security that we have already sold and are under no moral obligation of any kind whatever to maintain the price of.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I merely wanted to suggest to the gentleman that I think he omitted to say what I regarded as the most important argument advanced by the representatives of the Treasury Department, to wit, that it was their desire that this new issue of bonds should go generally to hundreds of small holders, which of course would not be possible in the case of 2 per cent bonds, and that there would be no object therefore in having the circulation privilege attached, the desire being not to have these bonds absorbed by the banks, but to have them spread generally over the country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not appreciate fully the argument of my friend from Ohio, when I realize that the Government of the United States has had adopted a savings-banks policy in which they propose to pay the depositors only 2½ per cent interest, and to which the depositors can go to-day and get 2½ per cent interest, for them to come here now and say they want to issue these bonds for the purpose of having them held by individual citizens instead of for circulation—in the face of already having adopted another policy for the citizen of the United States to lend money to the Government.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. ADAIR. Is there any provision in the law authorizing the issue of Panama bonds requiring the departments to charge a higher rate of interest to banks which may put them up as security for currency than is charged on the 2 per cent bonds?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not now. I merely suggested that could be done if the Treasury Department desired to balance the advisability of issuing these bonds for circulating purposes, but it is not the law now.

Mr. McCALL. Will the gentleman permit me to say what would be the object for the private investor to pay par for Government 2 per cent bonds when he can deposit his money with the Government and get 2½ per cent for it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I do not think there would be any object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Only very small investors, however.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have stated my position on the bill, and I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, this should be called a bill to sustain the assets of the national banks of the United States at the expense of the Government. If these bonds are put out at 3 per cent with the circulation privilege they will bring a higher price in the market than if they are put out at 3 per cent without the circulating privilege, because they will be worth more to the national banks of the United States. Now, in that respect I differ slightly from my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I believe that to some extent the national banks will sell their twos and buy these 3 per cents if they carry the circulation privilege, because, deducting the one-half per cent tax, they will get a half per cent more for holding the 3 per cent bonds with the circulating privilege than they would by holding the 2 per cent bonds.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HARRISON. I can not yield in only five minutes, I regret very much. If there is to be any profit made out of this bond transaction that profit should go, in my judgment, into the Treasury of the United States, and it should not be diverted by this proposed change in the law to the treasuries of the national banks of the United States. Now, the gentleman from Ohio advanced the argument that this exempting of these proposed bonds from the circulating privilege was for the purpose of disseminating these investments into the hands of small holders throughout the United States. That was the argument advanced by the Treasury officials before the committee, but in my judgment that is not entitled to an atom of respect. The people of the United States have not yet reached a point where they are going to tie their money up in 3 per cent Government bonds, which they have to buy at a premium, when the money markets of the world have during the last 10 years uniformly increased the returns to investors upon the highest gilt-edged securities. It was only 15 years ago when the British consols, then paying 3 per cent interest, were selling at 10 points premium. They are now at 2¼ interest and selling at 78.

The 2 per cent bonds of the United States were not so very long ago selling at 10 points premium. They are now down to about three-quarters of 1 per cent premium and the general tendency of the money markets all over the world is in the direction of giving the individual investor greater returns upon high grade gilt-edged securities. Now, that being so, in my judgment it is inevitable that the value of our 2 per cent bonds artificially sustained by our national-bank act are going down in the same way that other Government securities have gone down and in the same way they are all going down, and it is futile to attempt to stop this decline by any such legislation as this.

Mr. FORNES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. FORNES. Is it not a fact that the New York municipal bonds sold on a basis as low as 1.90; that the Massachusetts State bonds sold within the last 12 years on a basis as low as 1.80; and is it not a fact now that these very same bonds are selling not on a basis of 4 per cent but on a basis of about 3½ per cent?

Mr. HARRISON. I thank my colleague for the suggestion, and that is in line with the argument I am pursuing.

Mr. HILL rose.

Mr. HARRISON. I am very sorry to seem discourteous, but I have only two or three minutes and I must decline to yield. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one other point in this discussion which I have heard brought out and upon which I wish to dilate for the few moments which remain to me. This will be the beginning of the end of issuing United States bonds with the circulation privilege, and if we stop it now on these bonds we will stop it for good and for all. It would be most desirable to adopt some basis for our currency other than United States bonds, but until we have adopted some other system of banking we can not afford to close that market entirely to the issue of national currency.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to give me three minutes more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRISON. In the recent Roosevelt panic in 1907 in New York, the credit of the banks and of the trust companies was so restricted that the merchants of that community were obliged to deal in clearinghouse certificates. In other words, there was not enough currency to enable them to do their business. Now, if we take away from these Panama bonds the currency privilege, that in so far will restrict for the future the possible expansion of our money market at a time when we need it most.

Now, the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to that maintains that at the present time the market is saturated with bonds bearing the circulation privilege. Well, perhaps it is, but there are times of the year, and, at other times, from year to year, when the market becomes contracted, notably every year when it comes to moving the crops of the country, and at those times more money and not less money is necessary to transact the business of the country. If we now begin to chop off from the United States bonds the circulation privilege without giving in exchange some other method or basis for issuing the currency of the national banks, we thereby and in so far take away from the possibility of an extension of credit at times when the market needs it the most.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for that reason, in addition to the others that I have stated, I am opposed to this bill, and I hope the Congress will not—under the idea that we are obligated, even if it is only a moral obligation, to sustain the assets of the national banks—which is an erroneous conviction, I believe—put it out of the power of the national banks in the future to issue the currency which is needed by the business interests of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KORBLY].

Mr. KORBLY. Mr. Speaker, according to its title this is a bill—> to restrain the Secretary of the Treasury from receiving bonds issued to provide money for the building of the Panama Canal as security for the issue of circulating notes to national banks, and for other purposes.

The real purpose of the bill is not disclosed in its title. This purpose is to prevent some $700,000,000 worth of 2 per cent bonds from going below par in the market. In proof of this I wish to quote a few words from the speech of President Taft made on Lincoln's birthday, 1910, in New York City, as follows:

> We have now about $700,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds, with respect to which we owe a duty to the owners to see that these bonds may be taken care of without reduction below the par value thereof, because they were forced upon national banks at this low rate in order that the banks might have a basis of circulation.

Hence I am justified in saying that the real purpose of this bill is to prevent the Government 2 per cent bonds from going below par.

The Panama bonds named in this bill are the bonds which were authorized by the lamented Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act of August 5, 1909, which authorized the issuance of Panama bonds at a rate not excepting 3 per cent interest per annum to the amount of $290,569,000. This is the sum determined upon as necessary to effect reimbursement to the Treasury for advances from the general revenues and to pay for the work remaining to be done before the canal is completed. It is estimated that some $160,000,000 worth of these bonds must soon be sold for the purpose of reimbursing the Treasury and for the completion of the canal.

At the time these bonds were authorized the difficulties attending their issue could be clearly discerned. It was then well known that an issue would send below par more than $700,000,000 of outstanding 2 per cent bonds. These 2 per cent bonds were all issued under inducements pursuant to which the holders of 3 per cent, 4 per cent, and 5 per cent bonds accepted the 2 per cent bonds in their stead. The foremost inducement for this exchange was a reduction of the tax on the circulating notes of national banks from 1 per cent per annum to one-half per cent per annum on all circulation secured by the 2 per cent bonds. It was suggested at the time that the Government should safeguard the immense issue of 2 per cent bonds by a differential tax, equalizing the proposed 3 per cent bonds with the outstanding 2 per cent bonds; that is to say, if the Panama 3 per cent bonds were to be used to secure bank circulation, the tax on the bank notes issued in such a case would be increased so as to reduce the profits of the 3 per cent bonds to a point equal to the profits of the 2 per cent bonds. This, however, would have been, in effect, the issuance of more 2 per cent bonds, and the truth is that the large volume of 2 per cent bonds are in need of something more than the protection of a mere parity in this behalf.

In a speech made in the House on June 9, 1910, on postal savings banks, I said:

> It is well known that the President will not sell any of the 3 per cent bonds authorized by the new tariff law, for the reason that it would force an equal amount of the 2 per cents on the market on an investment basis, which would result in the "reduction below the par value thereof," probably of one-third. And it is actually proposed to invest the people's savings in these bonds, notwithstanding the widespread opinion that they would rule below par as an investment.

Another one of the purposes of this bill is to make easy the way for a central bank. The question of the establishment of a central bank of issue which shall provide currency in lieu of the national-bank notes now in circulation, is pressing to the front. This, of course, will be an administration measure. Those who are promoting the central-bank scheme recognize that one of the most difficult problems to be solved is that of providing for the national-bank notes now outstanding. It is clearly seen that in order to make satisfactory provision for these bank notes some means must be found for taking care of the $700,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds now pledged by the national banks to secure these notes. If the circulation privilege or burden, to speak more accurately, were to be taken from these notes they would fall in price to a point which would entail a tremendous loss upon the banks which hold them. The postal savings-bank scheme was adopted as one means of relief. It is proposed that the funds of the poor people will be used by the Government to take the 2 per cent bonds off the hands of the national bankers and thereby discharge the duty which the President said in his Lincoln birthday speech "we owe to the owners" thereof. In other words, we must not allow these 2 per cent bonds to be forced to an investment basis by the issuance of Panama bonds, but the washerwomen and the poor people, generally, who are not supposed to possess sufficient intelligence to make their own investments are to have their savings invested in these 2 per cent bonds by the Government, notwithstanding the fact that these bonds are likely to go below par and would go below par on a purely investment basis.

Over and over we have been told about the duty we owe to the national bankers who own the great bulk of the 2 per cent Government bonds, and it is a distressing thing to see the administration steadily pursuing a policy which indicates an intention to shift the burdens incident to these bonds from the shoulders of the bankers to the shoulders of the poor people.

The bill in question is another of the many proofs of the folly of bond-secured currency. What a ridiculous proposition that a bank note promising to pay the bearer a dollar shall be secured by a Government bond which would not sell in the markets for a dollar. The great function of currency is subordinated to the bond market.

Our experience with the so-called national currency has been an unhappy one. It had its origin in an attempt to force a market for United States bonds; and as is usual, one folly leads to another and this is the latest one to make its appearance. The Government of the United States has too long been in the banking business and incidentally in the business of supporting the bond market. The bonds of other nations sell in the markets of the world sometimes above par and sometimes below par. In the days of the Civil War and subsequently the American Government prided itself upon the fact that its bonds did not fall in price below par. This was merely closing the eyes to the fact that the bonds, which were a written express promise to pay, were measured in value by greenbacks, which were an only implied promise in writing to pay.

Unquestionably this bill discloses the fact that the Government of the United States has overreached itself in the matter of 2 per cent bonds. This ought to give pause to that apparently large number of people who regard the promise of the Government as the best security obtainable. It is very evident that the national bankers do not regard the possession of these bonds as the most desirable property, and instead of the administration looking the situation squarely in the face and admitting the truth of the statement that the outstanding 2 per cent bonds would not float at par on a purely investment basis, it seeks to conceal the fact by legislative juggiery. The honest, manly, statesmanlike way of meeting the difficulties of the situation is to refund all the bonds of the United States Government, so that any duty we owe to the owners thereof may be discharged by putting these bonds on such an investment basis as will protect the owners and conserve the honor of the Nation.

The Republican Party has boasted of its enlightenment and its capacity, but it has not shown incapacity and ignorance in anything more markedly than it has in dealing with the great question of banking and currency. This bill is but one more patch to the already crazy patchwork of the past 60 years.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, as it will be seen from the reading of it, is that all bonds hereafter issued for the purpose of raising money to build the Panama Canal shall contain a provision in such bond that they shall not be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issue of circulating notes to national banks, and the bonds containing such provision shall not be receivable for that purpose.

This legislation is proposed for the purpose of contracting the circulating medium of the country. It can have no other purpose. A scarcity of money makes money dearer, makes money scarce, and the rates of interest high. If it will not contract the currency, the circulating medium of the country, it will prevent an expansion of the same, and as the growing population and the commerce of the country require a greater volume of money to conduct the increasing business incident thereto, it will therefore have the effect to prevent the issuing of a larger amount of bank notes to meet the requirements of public demand.

It will do another thing, and that seems to be the real purpose of the bill. As I gather from the statements that have been made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], it might properly be inferred that it is a matter of speculation created by legislation to enable bondholders and speculators in bonds to appreciate the value of their holdings. It has been suggested that legislation ought to be enacted which would prevent a depreciation in the value of the bonds of any holder in this country. Upon what principle is that suggestion founded? Is there any more reason that legislation should be enacted to sustain the value of one man's property any more than that of another? If you are to legislate to sustain the value of the bondholder's bonds, you ought to legislate to maintain the value of the farmer's corn, of his wheat, and of the merchant's merchandise, and of every other product on the market. [Applause.]

Pass this measure and it will prove an obstruction to the expansion of our circulating medium and place in the hands of capitalists an instrument by which they can regulate the amount of currency at their pleasure for their advantage at the expense of the people and the business of the country. Pass it and it will swell by millions the profits of bond speculators by increasing the value of one kind of Government bonds and depreciating the value of the other kind.

The measure is indefensible, in my judgment, and should be defeated. [Applause.]

I suggest that the proper title of this bill should be "A bonus for the bondholder." This occurs to me from its provisions to be its real purpose, and this will be the effect of its passage. The millions of Government bonds issued for the construction of the Panama Canal will have taken from them one of their most valuable functions, that of securing the issue of national-bank notes, a circulating medium which constitutes a large portion of the amount of money in circulation. Eliminate this function from the Panama bonds and you depreciate their value on the market, lessen the demand for them, and increase the demands for all other Government bonds and appreciate their value. This result is inevitable. This is the real purpose for the passage of the bill. Any other purpose expressed is merely ostensible and not the real one.

It will injure the advantages now secured to the people for a stable expansion of the currency of the country by limiting the securities for the issuing of national-bank notes, and for this reason in the event of a money stringency at any time would inure very advantageously to the benefit of the money sharks and enable them to exact larger interest for money loaned. Our population is rapidly increasing, our commerce is growing daily, and to enable us to conduct it freely and profitably ample money must be provided to meet its requirements.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR].

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, during the four years I have occupied a seat in this House I have bitterly opposed all forms of special privilege and class legislation. I shall vote against this bill, because I consider it a proposition solely in the interest of the banks and individual bondholders. Congress has authorized the issue of $200,000,000 of bonds, at a maximum rate of 3 per cent, to pay for the construction of the Panama Canal.

The question involved in this bill is, How shall these bonds be issued? Shall they be issued with or without the circulation privilege? To issue them without the circulation privilege will undoubtedly lessen their value and decrease the amount the Government will realize from their sale. To issue them with the circulation privilege will increase their value and add to the amount the Government will realize from their sale.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to stand by the interests of the Government and the people by voting against the passage of this bill. I want the Government to receive the very best price for these bonds, therefore I shall not vote to lessen their value by taking away from them the privilege or right to be deposited with the United States Treasury for the purpose of securing circulation of bank notes. The real motive behind this bill is to increase the value of the outstanding 2 per cent bonds, of which there are $912,000,000, and this is to be done for the benefit of the banks and individual bondholders. While I am interested in the banking business myself and would profit by the passage of this bill, I shall nevertheless vote against it and fight it just as hard as I would any other bill intended to enrich the few at the expense of the many. We are not here to legislate in the interest of the banks and bondholders, but we are here to legislate for all, and to see that everybody gets a square deal. Our duty is to the Treasury and the people, and that is the side I propose to advocate. The Member who votes for this bill must answer to his constituents and can not escape the consequences.

The country is growing rapidly and our increased population will necessitate the organization of more banks to care for the increased business, and these additional banks will be required to put up bonds with the Government to secure circulation. Of the $912,000,000 2 per cent bonds now outstanding, all except $72,000,000 are now owned by the banks and are deposited with the Treasury to secure circulation. This only leaves $72,000,000 available for new banks organizing in the future. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it will readily be seen that if the Panama bonds are denied the same privilege as the present 2 per cent bonds, it will create a very large demand for the twos and materially increase their value. This result will greatly inure to the benefit of the banks, while it will depreciate the value of the Panama bonds and work an injury to the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. Speaker, it has been argued here that to allow these bonds the circulation privilege will depreciate the value of the outstanding 2 per cent bonds held by the banks, and that it is the duty of the Government to maintain all of its securities at par. In the first place, I do not believe the 2 per cent bonds will depreciate, and, besides, the Government is under no obligation to guarantee their market value. The purchaser of a Government bond takes the same chance that the purchaser of any other bond takes. The value of all bonds goes up and down according to the prevailing interest rates and business conditions. If you are going to ask the Government to guarantee the price of bonds for the benefit of the bondholders, why not with equal consistency ask the Government to guarantee the price of the farmer's products or the products of the manufacturer.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, this is simply a scheme to blacklist the Panama Canal bond issue for the benefit of a bond-holding class. I am not surprised that the Wall Street interests are back of this proposition, but I am surprised at the argument some gentlemen are making on this floor. To provide that no other bonds shall be issued to secure circulation except the $912,000,000 now owned by a few people is the worst form of class legislation, and I am unalterably opposed to it.

Not only is it class legislation, but what would be the result in case of a money panic? Everybody well remembers that during the Roosevelt panic in 1907 actual money in circulation was insufficient to carry on the business, and in all the large cities they resorted to clearinghouse certificates, while in many country towns banks were forced to limited payments. Now, if you take away from the Panama bonds the circulation privilege, you will make it impossible to expand our money market at the very time it is most needed. This bill, if passed, can not but contract the circulating medium of the country, and by so doing makes money scarce and interest rates high. This will work a great hardship on the merchant, laborer, farmer, and manufacturer, and no Member who has the interest of the plain people at heart should support it.

Mr. Speaker, the issue is plain. It is the people against the bondholders. It is the interest of the masses against the selfish interest of the speculator. It is simply a proposition to rob the United States Treasury of the true value of the Panama bonds and add to the burdens of an already overtaxed people for the benefit of a bond-holding class. I am opposed to it. I shall vote to safeguard the Treasury and protect the people. I sincerely hope this bill will be defeated, and that this day will mark the beginning when the granting of special privileges will be brought to an end.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I consumed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 28 minutes remaining.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. I want to state to our party friends over here and our contending friends on this side that this bill is, in effect, equivalent to making a direct appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States to cover losses which may be incurred by the holders of present bonds. That is what it means, because if you blacklist future issues of bonds of this Government for the benefit of the men who already own the bonds now outstanding and damage the selling value of the future issues of bonds, to the extent of that depreciation it is a direct appropriation to the present bondholders.

How many stockholders of national banks in this House are going to vote for this measure that is of direct personal interest to them? I hope not one. If you will not vote for it on account of being interested, why would you vote for it at all? Whenever you say that a future issue of United States bonds, the securities of the Government that must be issued perhaps to carry on war or defend the Nation, may be blacklisted in the effort to sustain the value of personal property of private and corporate holders, I say in effect that any man who buys Government bonds does it under the rule of caveat emptor—takes the risk and takes the profit if there is one, and takes the loss if there is no profit. Six hundred and thirty-six millions of these bonds are now owned by the banks, on which they have issued circulation to the par value. They get interest on the bonds at 2 per cent, and they get interest at 6 or 8 or 10 per cent, or whatever they loan the circulation for, in addition. There never was an hour since the Civil War, when the bonds are used to secure circulation, that the interest on the bonds so deposited should not have stopped immediately.

The proposition is brought up here that the banks bought these bonds to use as security to get United States deposits. What do they want with deposits? To loan them out for a profit. The whole object and purpose of buying these bonds to secure deposits was to make money for the banks, for the stockholders.

The people are not going to be fooled by such a measure as this. They know that this is in the interest of the Banking Trust of this country, the Money Trust, and you can not fool them one bit. If this bill will not reduce the price of the bonds hereafter to be sold, it will not reduce the price of those already sold. You can not get away from the inevitable, natural, logical result of this act.

Now, if any of you gentlemen on that side, or anybody on this side, wants to vote here directly in the interest of private holders, in order to make sure that purchasers have made no mistake in purchasing the bonds heretofore purchased, he should understand that the bonds were in fact purchased for speculative, selfish, business reasons. Who ever heard of bankers and financiers loaning out their circulation for anything less than the interest which money loaned was commanding at the time the loan was made? Why, I am astonished that our Republican friends, who have always been the friends of the national banks when they have had any friends, should come now, when they are about to go out of this House, and make this last dying effort, in order to sustain the banks and the private owners of the stock, and ask that we blacklist the securities of the Government itself in order to do so.

If these issues are to be deprived of any of the elements of value that the other issues ever had, then the argument will be made and the precedent will be set with respect to some other issue of bonds, issued, perhaps, to build a canal or do some other Government work, and that precedent will be cited as the reason for doing it again. I am astonished that financiers and great statesmen should think of embarking upon a proposition of this kind. The day will come when you may want to add taxes of certain issues, when someone who for selfish reasons has bought bonds for profit or speculation will invoke the precedent now sought to be established. My friends, that is bad business.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will take some of his time, if he has anybody else who wants to make any speech.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PUJO].

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker, I regret not to be in sympathy with the views expressed on this bill by the chairman-to-be of the Ways and Means Committee, but as we disagree as to the premise we naturally arrive at different conclusions.

The Payne Tariff Act of 1909 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow $290,569,000 on Panama bonds at an interest-bearing rate not exceeding 3 per cent for the purpose of reimbursing the Treasury in that sum advanced and used in the construction of the Panama Canal.

The alternative to issue short-term certificates of indebtedness to obtain this sum would not meet but would merely temporize with the situation. These Panama bonds, as all others issued by the Government, have the privilege of being used to secure bank circulation.

Under the terms of the bill now under consideration, should it be enacted into law, the bonds for $290,569,000 will be issued by the Treasury Department, but they will not enjoy the privilege of being used as the basis for securing national bank-note circulation.

It has been urged by some who are opposed to this measure that the effect of such legislation will be to maintain by law the market price of the 2 per cent bonds maturing in 1930, heretofore sold by the Government and now held by the banks, to the extent of $607,198,000.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a correct statement of the purposes sought to be accomplished by the bill. When the Government of the United States issued these 2 per cent interest-bearing bonds, maturing in 1930, it refunded outstanding threes, fours, and fives amounting to $646,250,150.

The greater part of these 2 per cents were purchased by the banks at par, some at 101, 102, and 103. All of the 2 per cents are now about at par. The banks used these 2 per cent bonds to secure their bank-note circulation, which has increased from $300,000,000 in 1900 to more than $700,000,000 at this time. Should the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to pay for the work on the Panama Canal as it progresses, issue the bonds authorized for that purpose, amounting to almost $300,000,000, we would have a bank-note circulation of $1,000,000,000.

I do not believe that the circulating medium of the United States should be based upon a Government bond, as it is merely a promise to pay. I think the time has come when we should by a legislative act show that we are going to put a stop to this system and endeavor to go to a more scientific and stable one.

It would almost be an act of bad faith on the part of our Government to issue these Panama bonds bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent with the privilege of being used as a basis for circulation, because the immediate and approximate effect of such legislation would be to impair the value of the $730,000,000 2 per cent bonds now at par. I do not for one moment contend that it is the function of the Government to maintain the market level of its obligations, but I do insist that the Government should not by its own act depreciate the value of its own obligations, sold by it to citizens at par and above, by issuing obligations of a similar character bearing a higher rate of interest. Why? Because the $730,000,000 2 per cent bonds, already issued, would fall at least 10 per cent, thus causing loss to the holders of approximately $70,000,000 or more.

On the other hand, should the 3 per cent Panama bonds, to be issued, not enjoy the privilege of being used for circulation, they will be bought by our citizens instead of financial institutions, thereby affording the humblest of our citizens a safe investment. It is interesting to note in this connection that out of the $912,000,000 of United States bonds outstanding, more than 80 per cent are held by national banks and only 20 per cent among our entire population, exceeding 90,000,000 people.

In France, with a population not exceeding 45,000,000, nearly 5,000,000 people are holders of the national bonds.

Mr. Speaker, it has been claimed that this measure is in favor of the national banks of the country, but this will not bear analysis. Should the bill become a law, the banks can not buy and then use them as a basis for circulation, issuing notes to their par value, and then obtaining the 3 per cent interest less the duty on circulation. A reasonable deduction to be drawn from this legislation is that it will develop patriotism among our people, who will invest in the bonds; and it will likewise have a tendency to bring into circulation hoarded money which is wary of all investments that are not secured by the Government.

I give my unqualified indorsement to the principles of this bill and hope that it will pass.

I will add as an appendix to these remarks a statement of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. A. Piatt Andrew, dated February 24, 1911, marked "A;" statement showing the prices at which 1930 bonds were refunded, marked "B;" and analysis of United States bond holdings, marked "C."

A.

STATEMENT OF ASSISTANT SECRETARY ANDREW OF THE TREASURY, FEBRUARY 24, 1911.

Secretary MacVeagh and the officers of the Treasury are awaiting with great anxiety the action which the House of Representatives may take with respect to the bill to authorize the issue of Panama bonds without the circulation privilege. This bill was proposed by Secretary MacVeagh, has passed the Senate, and now awaits the action of the House. That Secretary MacVeagh will be obliged to borrow money before many months have elapsed seems clear. The working balance which stood at $37,000,000 on December 31 and at $30,000,000 on January 31 was reduced, according to the cash statement of February 21, to less than $25,000,000. Any considerable further decrease will bring it close to the danger point. Then the Secretary must begin to borrow. Under existing legislation, although he is authorized to borrow $290,569,000 on Panama bonds at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent, the want of adjustment with respect to the circulation tax on national-bank notes issued against these new bonds forbids his issuing them at 3 per cent, the only rate at which they would find an investment market. Accordingly, if Congress fails to pass the pending bill, the Secretary might be driven to the temporary expedient of short-term certificates of indebtedness. Fortunately, he may withhold from these certificates the privilege of their being used as a basis for national-bank circulation.

Recognizing that these certificates are only a temporary expedient, however, Secretary MacVeagh has urged upon Congress the passage of a law authorizing him to issue the Panama bonds without the circulation privilege. He bases his indorsement of this bill on a number of reasons.

We believe, first, that the Government bonds, because of the security which they offer as means of investment, should be available not merely for the banks but for the general public. Of the $912,000,000 of United States bonds now outstanding, $735,000,000, or more than four-fifths, are held by the national banks, and outside of the national banks only 20,000 among our 92,000,000 of people are registered holders of the Government debt. On the other hand, of the population of France of only 40,000,000 between 4,000,000 and 5,000,000 are holders of Government bonds. So long as the circulation privilege is attached to our Government bonds, and especially so long as such bonds yield an interest rate of less than 3 per cent, there can be little opportunity for the general public to share in their ownership. The bonds of the most stable European governments to-day sell at prices which yield more than 3 per cent—the British consols at their present prices yield 3.16 per cent; the French rentes, 3.06 per cent; and the German imperial 3 per cent bonds, 3.61 per cent. It is not likely that the credit of our Government is so much higher than the credit of England, France, or Germany that we could borrow upon an investment basis of much less than 3 per cent.

If a 3 per cent bond were issued to-day under the conditions prescribed by the act of August 5, 1909, with circulation privileges attached, subject to a tax of only 1 per cent, those bonds would have an advantage over all other United States bonds, when used for circulation, amounting to one-half of 1 per cent per year, which would insure their purchase by the banks and preclude their purchase by the general public. The demand in certain parts of the country for a system of bank-deposit guaranty and the demand for a Government-guaranteed postal-savings system would seem to indicate a desire for such governmentally secured means of investment as would be presented by Government bonds available to the public. This can only be achieved by the withdrawal of the circulation privilege, which keeps our bonds in the possession of national banks.

Our second reason is based upon the practical agreement which exists among students of banking, however much they may differ in regard to the ideal system, that the system of bond-secured currency ought to be done away with. Within the last 10 years this system has become more deeply intrenched than in any other decade since its establishment. Since 1900 the circulation secured by United States bonds has increased from $300,000,000 to more than $700,000,000. If the Treasury is not relieved from the obligation to issue bonds with the circulation privilege as prescribed by the act of August 5, 1909, there is likely to be added nearly $300,000,000 more to this unscientific and generally condemned currency system. The Treasury Department asks Congress to be relieved from the necessity of further intrenching this system.

A third reason for denying the new Panama bonds the circulation privilege is that there is absolutely no connection between the requirements of the country for revenue to pay for the construction of the Panama Canal and the need of the country for additional circulating medium. Most authorities are agreed that the money supply of the world has increased too rapidly in the last decade. The world-wide rise in the prices of commodities, though due to a variety of causes in particular instances, has doubtless been largely influenced by the vast increase in gold production, which in this country has resulted in an increase in our gold stock from $600,000,000 in 1896 to over $1,600,000,000 in 1910, to which we have also added $500,000,000 of national-bank notes. This means an increase per capita from $21 to $35, or about 65 per cent. On this account it would seem unfortunate to add artificially to the existing plethora of money at the present time and so contribute further to the general rise in prices.

If the circulation privilege were removed from the Panama bonds the Secretary of the Treasury would still be able to provide for additional issues of bank notes in time of emergency through the issue of certificates of indebtedness, of which he is authorized to issue $200,000,000, which may, but need not, be made available for circulation, as well as through the instrumentalities provided by the Aldrich-Vreeland Act of May 30, 1908.

As a final argument, we feel that the consideration that the market value of the $730,000,000 of outstanding 2 per cent bonds would probably fall below par as a result ought to forbid the issue of additional bonds bearing the circulation privilege. The outstanding 2s, though issued some two or three points above par, have already lost their premium value and for several years have hovered about par. The national banks have already written off some $25,000,000 to cover the loss due to the decline in the price of these bonds which has already occurred. According to the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, they still carry these bonds at a premium of $10,060,037. If the authorized 290 million Panama bonds were issued with the circulation privilege, the bonds now held would probably drop from 10 to 15 points, causing an additional loss to the banks of from $70,000,000 to $100,000,000. Secretary MacVeagh is of the opinion that the Treasury ought not to be forced to take any step which would cause such losses to the national banking system.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask general leave to print for those who speak on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks general leave to print for all those who speak on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman from Connecticut permit me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. HILL. Yes; if it is not taken out of my time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to have the gentleman address himself to the effect of this provision on the market price of the bonds, in view of the statement in the report that there are about $220,000,000 bonds now outstanding which are available to secure circulation.

Mr. HILL. I will come to that in just a moment. The gist of the remarks made thus far on the Democratic side of the Chamber is that this legislation is for the benefit of private bondholders. Gentlemen, you never were more mistaken in your lives. These 2 per cent bonds are held largely by small banks in the country. In 1900 a new law was passed, and since that time 4,600 little banks, most of them banks of $25,000 capital, have been organized, and they are scattered through your country towns. This is not a matter that seriously affects New England. We have only 10 per cent of the national-bank capital of this country anyway. Two thousand six hundred of those little banks are in your towns in the West and South, several hundred of them in the State of Texas, if I am not mistaken.

These banks have been compelled by law to take these bonds. They have not taken them as a matter of speculation. No national bank can organize without taking 25 per cent of its capital in Government bonds. They are not obliged to issue circulation against those bonds, but they must buy them, and they have bought them, and every dollar of these 2 per cents now outstanding, except the $87,000,000 Panamas, are those bonds which have been issued under the refunding act, and which have been taken largely by your country banks in the West and South. They have not gone into New England, they have not gone into the pockets of private bondholders at all. You never were more mistaken in your lives as to the situation than you are in regard to this, and I refer any gentleman who wants a verification of that statement to the last comptroller's report lying on my desk.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Does the gentleman think that ought to change our attitude?

Mr. HILL. Not a bit. I am a bank stockholder myself, and anybody who wants to discount my statement because of that fact can do so if he sees fit; but that does not alter the fact that I am going to tell the truth on the floor of the House.

Mr. FORNES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly, if I have time.

Mr. FORNES. The gentleman states that most of these bonds were taken by the small banks. Did not the City National Bank of New York increase its capital and did not the Bank of Commerce, and almost every large bank, within the last 5 or 10 years increase its capital? If so, where did they obtain the bonds to make that increase?

Mr. HILL. They were organized before the act of March, 1900, and had the fours and threes as well as twos. To be sure, some of them refunded them, but one of the principal objects of the act of March 14, 1900, was to institute small banks throughout the country. That was one of the purposes for which the 2 per cent refunding act was passed.

Mr. FORNES. Was not the purpose of it to increase the capital of the large banks?

Mr. HILL. We have $290,000,000 of bonds to issue. Congress has decided to pay the expenses of the Panama Canal by a bond issue. You have authorized those bonds with the circulation privilege attaching to them. You have now a total of $216,000,000 of Government bonds unused for the circulation privilege. The amount taken up last year was $9,000,000. If the same process goes on, it will take 24 years to use up the $216,000,000 of bonds already outstanding.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. If I have time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much money is deposited in the national banks?

Mr. HILL. Forty-eight millions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the nature of the security?

Mr. HILL. Government bonds.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there any outside security?

Mr. HILL. Not at present, but they can take something else. You have got something else with the circulation privilege, the same as you have for deposits. Talk about needing this issue for circulation—it would be just like any one of you gentlemen issuing all the notes your credit will stand and then doubling it. It would be a foolish thing for you to do, and it is a foolish thing for the Government to do. What have we got? Not only two hundred and sixteen millions of unused bonds, but on the statute books is a law which authorizes the use for emergency circulation of three hundred millions more of promiscuous bonds. The circulation privilege is saturated now.

Mr. Speaker, I find that my time has expired, and, availing myself of the privilege of the House, I will take the liberty of briefly extending my remarks in the RECORD, and submit herewith as a part of such remarks the report of the committee, which I was requested to prepare:

[House Report No. 2031, Sixty-first Congress, third session.]

BONDS FOR BUILDING PANAMA CANAL.

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 32218) to restrain the Secretary of the Treasury from receiving bonds issued to provide money for the building of the Panama Canal as security for the issue of circulating notes to national banks, and for other purposes, respectfully report that they have had the same under consideration and recommend its adoption.

The purpose of the bill is to procure funds for the payment of the expense of the construction of the Panama Canal.

The total amount expended on purchase and construction of the canal to date is $226,841,768.88. Of this amount there has been paid from proceeds of sale of bonds, including premiums, $87,309,594.83. The balance, $139,532,174.05, has been paid from the general fund of the Treasury and is reimbursable from proceeds of bonds not yet sold.

The total bonds authorized by existing law for the construction of the Panama Canal is $375,200,980, less the number of 2 per cent Panama bonds issued to date in the sum of $84,631,980, leaving a balance of $290,569,000, which were authorized under the provisions of section 39 of the tariff act of 1909. Under the provisions of this act these bonds were authorized to be issued with a rate of interest not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, and the authority for the issuance of further Panama bonds at an interest rate of 2 per cent was by the same act repealed.

There is now outstanding of 2 per cent bonds having the privilege of securing circulation an amount of $730,882,130 and an actual deposit for the security of circulation of the sum of $660,136,080, leaving a margin of $70,000,000 of 2 per cent outstanding bonds over and above the amount now required. The total amount of all kinds of bonds available for circulation purposes outstanding is $913,316,590. Of this amount there is now on deposit to secure circulation $696,758,220, leaving a margin of outstanding bonds available for further circulation of $216,558,370.

From this statement it is manifest that the market for the bonds possessing this privilege is saturated and that the Treasury could not hope to sell the new issue at any appreciable addition to the price because of the circulation privilege being attached to the bonds; on the other hand, it is perfectly manifest that if a 3 per cent bond, issued to meet the expenses of the Panama Canal, is now issued with that privilege it will inevitably have the effect of a corresponding reduction in the value of the 2 per cent bond with the same privilege. Of this the Secretary says:

"By the opinion of everybody 3 per cent is as low as you can market these bonds, unless, of course, you could force them on the banks as the 2 per cent bonds were previously forced on the banks, but that is no longer possible. It is a condition of complete saturation and you can not put in any more moisture; but we do not want to do this if we could. It would be utterly unfair and it would destroy the present market value of the bonds. They have been held at par, but held there by their eyelids. They have succeeded in holding them at par, but if you put another issue on top there is no power in the financial world which could hold them at par."

I am advised by the Treasury Department that the value of a 2 per cent of 1930 upon a 3 per cent basis would be 85.464, and there can not be any question but what the further issue of $290,000,000 of bonds with like privileges, except at a 3 per cent rate of interest, would bring the 2 per cent bonds to this value and with the probable result of a withdrawal of circulation of about $120,000,000 in order to keep the bonds now on deposit at par with the amount of circulation taken out against them as required by law.

To avoid this contingency and meet the absolute necessity both of an immediate and future supply of funds to carry on the work of the Panama Canal, it is the desire of the Treasury Department to float this new issue at 3 per cent as an investment security, putting the same upon the market in small amounts from time to time as conditions justify and the necessity for funds occurs, and it is believed that this can be done at a rate slightly above par without any shock to existing financial conditions.

The alternative to this proposition is the issuance of 3 per cent one-year certificates, which the Treasury has authority to issue to the amount of $100,000,000, but your committee believes that it would be far better to permanently provide for the expenditures for the construction of the Panama Canal by the issue of these 50-year 3 per cent bonds, and thus carry out the intentions of Congress as manifested by the provision in the tariff act of 1909.

They therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There is no probability, even if these 3 per cent bonds were put out with the privilege of circulation, that they would be taken by the banks in lieu of the 2 per cents which they are now hold, for the reason that at the price of 85.464, which the Treasury states would be the equivalent value of a 2 per cent bond as compared with a 3 per cent for investment, the profit on circulation based upon 2 per cents would be materially larger than it would upon the 3 per cents, because there would be a gradual appreciation of the principal invested until maturity, when the bond would be worth par instead of the purchase price, 85.464, so that until the outstanding twos were all exhausted probably no additional value would come to the new issue of threes because of the circulation privilege.

Under existing law the Secretary of the Treasury is compelled to require national banks to maintain the bond security to the full amount of circulation outstanding, and if at any time the bonds fall below par the banks would be required to do one of two things: First, buy additional bonds to make the margin good, or, as an alternative, to reduce circulation to the market value of the bonds. In the one case the issuance of these bonds with the circulation privilege would take more than one hundred millions of money from commercial uses for a permanent investment in additional bonds, or what would be more likely, would compel a like amount of circulation to be withdrawn.

I am wholly unable to understand how the Democratic Members of this House, with very few exceptions, can put themselves in the position of deliberately voting to depreciate the value of the bonded indebtedness of the United States, especially in view of the fact that at the last election by the deliberate action of the people of this country they were given control of the House of Representatives and were, so to speak, put on probation until another election should be held.

They have already announced that they intend to bring in at the next session of Congress and put on trial a tariff for revenue only. One would naturally suppose that the last thing they would desire would be financial disturbance or a stringency in the money market during the coming fall when their new tariff scheme is to go to the country.

Nobody knows to-day whether the Wilson tariff bill of 1894 was in and of itself a failure, or whether the failure was due in whole or in part to the financial conditions which obtained at that time. It is only fair to our Democratic friends to admit that it was born in a panic and was cut off in its childhood with the financial depression still in existence.

It would seem that their desire now would be to give to the child to be born a clear field in which to run and be glorified, and no obstructions of any kind or character put in its pathway, and yet upon the very threshold of their entrance to power we see the Republican and Democratic Parties lined up in opposition to each other, the Democratic Party declaring its undying hostility to the national banking system and a sound currency and the Republican Party favoring any and all legislation looking to the maintenance of the credit of the Government and the preservation of sound financial and industrial conditions in the business world.

Little thought was given in the last election to the fact that the time was rapidly approaching when more financial legislation would be needed in order to save the national credit and give to the country a greatly improved system of currency. It will be of little satisfaction now to those people who voted last November to transfer the House of Representatives to Democratic control that at the very first opportunity the unfortunate financial vagaries which have controlled the Democratic Party in years gone by should be again brought to the front and accepted practically without change by the men to whom this new lease of power was given.

I commend it to the careful consideration of the country.

In the wonderful development of our industries and the tremendous growth of our population this country can stand almost any form of tariff legislation and still struggle on without complete and total collapse and ultimately adjust itself to the change, but a bad currency system is not only bad in the beginning, but is sure to go on in an increasing degree to the inevitable end of national and individual bankruptcy.

The one overshadowing necessity of this country in the near future is legislation looking to radical improvements in our banking and currency system, and if the attitude of the two parties to-day on this measure is indicative of their respective policies in the future, the men who cast their votes for a Democratic House of Representatives in the last election will have abundant cause to regret their action.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I favor the passage of this bill because as I see it it is a plain, business, common-sense proposition. We have issued more than $700,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds. Everybody knows that these bonds at 2 per cent were not investment bonds. The Government has been enabled to maintain them at par and above par because they have the circulation privilege. Now it is proposed to issue $290,000,000 of 3 per cent bonds and give them the same circulation privilege. If we do so we will disparage the credit of the Government and drive down the 2 per cent bonds below par.

I believe in maintaining the credit of the Government. I do not believe that it is right, I do not believe that it is a good business proposition, I do not believe it is sound policy for the Government to put out a 2 per cent bond which was not an investment bond, which was maintained at par because of the artificial value that was given to it by reason of the circulation privilege, and then put out a higher interest rate bond and thereby depreciate the value of the former bond and disparage the credit of the Government by forcing its 2 per cent bonds below par.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would not the same logic apply to the action of the Government when it refunded under the act of 1900 and issued the 2 per cent bonds at 102?

Mr. PADGETT. Not at all; because that was a matter of interest calculation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is a matter of interest calculation.

Mr. PADGETT. Not at all; it is a question of policy. When you give the 3 per cent bonds the privilege that we gave to the 2 per cent bond and which held it at par, we are depreciating the value of the 2 per cent bond below par and thereby injuring and disparaging the credit of the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A 3 per cent bond with a circulation privilege would bring more than without it, would it not?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not believe under existing circumstances that it would increase the value of the 3 per cent bond. I think it would simply supplement the 2 per cent bond and throw it as a drug on the market.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DAWSON].

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take this opportunity of printing in the RECORD a brief history of legislation relating to the greenbacks. This is done with the thought that it may prove of interest in view of the widespread study and discussion of the currency question which now prevails throughout the country.

The greenback was born February 25, 1862, and was a child of the desperate financial situation created by the Civil War and the almost exclusive circulation of wildcat State-bank notes. The bottom of the National Treasury was being scraped to provide funds for carrying on the war, and the issue of these notes was deemed essential to the very existence of the Government. It is not surprising that a child born of such parents and during such travail should have a turbulent and eventful life.

On the above date a law was enacted authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue 150,000,000 of United States notes, ever since known as greenbacks, on the credit of the Government. If you will examine one of these notes you will find printed on the back that it "is a legal tender at its face value for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt," and this constituted the principal propelling force behind them. They were given a continuous lease on life, it being provided that when redeemed at the Treasury they should be reissued and kept in circulation.

Four months later an equal amount was authorized, and nine months after that another equal sum was provided for, of which $50,000,000 were to be used to redeem temporary loans. As the volume increased the purchasing power decreased. Before the first 100,000,000 had been issued a paper dollar was worth about 87 cents in gold. When 300,000,000 were in circulation they were 23 cents below par. When the public debt reached its maximum, on August 31, 1865, there were $432,553,912 of greenbacks in circulation, and they were slightly over 30 per cent below par, although the fluctuations had at times carried them down to a much lower figure.

It was the intention of the leaders in Congress that these irredeemable paper promises should ultimately be redeemed or convertible into real money, and to that end it was provided by law in 1864 that the total amount outstanding should never exceed $400,000,000, and until this limit was reached in the process of reduction, all notes redeemed were to be canceled and retired from circulation.

When the war drew to a close the money circulation of the country consisted of the greenbacks and State bank notes, gold and silver having almost entirely disappeared. The national bank act, which was passed in 1863, was now liberalized in its provisions, and with the rise in the circulation of national bank notes Congress set about to put a few crimps in the greenback circulation, in pursuance of a well-defined policy looking to their future redemption or convertibility.

In the early part of Johnson's administration a law was passed providing for their retirement at the rate of not more than ten millions within the following six months, and thereafter at the rate of four millions per month. Correlated to this, and as a part of the general financial policy, was the act placing a 10 per cent tax on State bank notes, which effectually retired them from circulation. This legislation was designed to increase the stability and security of the currency system by exterminating the wildcat State bank notes and gradually replacing them and the greenbacks retired with bond-secured national-bank notes.

Under this legislation of 1866 the national-bank circulation did not increase as rapidly as had been expected, and the result was a temporary stringency in the money market. These causes, coupled with the political agitation on the subject, resulted in the act of February 4, 1868, which repealed the former law and suspended the process of retirement and cancellation. The greenbacks outstanding had been reduced to three hundred and fifty-six millions.

Ever since the close of the war the money question had been gradually drifting into politics, and this legislation had the effect of injecting an additional amount of partisanship into the subject. The Democrats, forgetting their opposition to the original issue of the greenbacks, now became their ardent champion. They not only opposed retirement, but went to the other extreme and favored their further issuance without any specified limit. The political exigencies of the period incubated a variety of other schemes. The bondholder was the principal subject of attack, and a proposition was set on foot to pay the principal of the five-twenty bonds in greenbacks. The Democrats took up this proposal with energy and enthusiasm and incorporated it in their national platform of 1868 as one of the leading planks. The Republicans took the ground that such a step was opposed to the spirit of the law, and would be virtual repudiation. Sides were taken along these lines, and it is hardly necessary to chronicle that Gen. Grant won an overwhelming victory at the polls.

President Grant called a special session of Congress shortly after taking his seat, and the first law that he signed was the act of March 18, 1869, to strengthen the public credit, a similar bill having been defeated by President Johnson only a short time before by means of a "pocket veto." This act declared that the faith of the Government is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin of all the greenbacks. It further solemnly pledged the faith of the Government to make provision for such redemption at the earliest practicable period.

Backed by this pledge and strengthened by this solemn assurance the greenback traveled along an even path for the next four years, the aggregate amount outstanding remaining at $356,000,000 until the panic of 1873 came on, with Black Friday and the suspension of currency payments in all the large cities of the country. Under the stress of this monetary crisis the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. William A. Richardson, of Massachusetts, put into circulation $26,000,000 of the greenbacks which had been retired by the act of 1866. The administration held that the law of 1866, while it provided for a reduction of the greenbacks, did not repeal that part of the law of 1864 which fixed the maximum at $400,000,000, and therefore the $44,000,000 between the amount outstanding and this maximum limit constituted an emergency reserve.

The currency thus paid out by the Treasury did much to prevent further spread of the panic and its disastrous consequences. These new notes also had the effect of producing a lively debate when Congress met as to the legality of their issue. Out of all the discussion came a Senate bill to fix the maximum amount of greenbacks at $400,000,000, thus in effect legalizing Secretary Richardson's emergency issue and relieving the Treasury from the embarrassment of exercising a disputed power, and further providing for an increase of $46,000,000 of bank-note circulation, but the measure was vetoed by President Grant, and sufficient votes could not be mustered to pass it over the veto. Later in the session an appropriation bill was made the vehicle for passing through Congress a proviso by which the maximum amount outstanding was fixed at $382,000,000.

All this time the country was on a paper basis, and the sentiment was steadily growing in favor of making concrete provisions for specie resumption. President Grant had repeatedly urged it in his messages to Congress, expressing the opinion in his message to the first session of the Forty-third Congress in December, 1873, that the country "can never have permanent prosperity until a specie basis is reached." This sentiment had crystallized into a determination among the Republicans to bring about this result during that Congress, but the first session was fruitless in this particular. The election of a Democratic House of Representatives in the fall of 1874 served as the necessary spur, and during the short session between that election and the 4th of March following, when the new Congress would begin, the resumption act was passed by a unique and somewhat unusual method of procedure.

Promptly after the assembling of Congress in December, 1874, the Republicans of the Senate named a select committee of 11, which soon drafted a measure and submitted it to the party caucus. The bill was so adroitly drawn that men of widely divergent views accepted it, by placing their own construction upon its phraseology. From one who was a member of this committee of 11 I learn that the caucus not only unanimously agreed to support the measure and pass it without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t," but also that no Republican would debate the bill or undertake to explain its provisions on the floor of the Senate. In the discussion which followed it must have been a little embarrassing for Senator Sherman, then chairman of the Finance Committee, in charge of the bill, to answer all inquiries from opponents of the measure as to the interpretation or effect of its provisions by saying that the bill spoke for itself and each Senator could read it and decide for himself as to the true construction to be placed upon it. Under these tactics the bill ran the gantlet of unlimited Senate debate in a few days, speedily passed the House, and became a law before the middle of January over the signature of President Grant, who took the unusual method of conveying the notice of approval to Congress in a special message.

In addition to the provisions for the resumption of specie payments on January 1, 1879, the bill provided for a gradual redemption and retirement of the greenbacks to an amount equal to 80 per cent of the national-bank notes thereafter issued, until the amount of greenbacks outstanding should be 300,000,000 and no more, and provided for a fund in the Treasury by sale of bonds and accumulation of surplus for such redemption. Beyond this a layman should perhaps not undertake to interpret this law, inasmuch as there was among its supporters in Congress a marked difference of opinion as to whether or not these notes when redeemed should be reissued. A few years later Congress dispelled all doubt on this point by further legislation.

Once again the retirement of the greenbacks commenced. The process continued steadily until late in the spring of 1878, when once again further retirement was prohibited by the act of May 31, after thirty-five millions had been retired. The amount had been reduced to $346,681,016, and these are still outstanding, except those lost or destroyed. Congress in this law specifically provided that all the greenbacks then outstanding should be reissued after redemption. Thus was forged the "endless chain" which was dragged through the Treasury during the second Cleveland administration, drawing a constant stream of gold along with it.

The greenback enjoyed a fairly peaceful existence in the currency system of the Government for the next 12 years, so far as legislation goes, but it was not forgotten politically. A national party appeared in 1876 calling itself the Greenback Party, which maintained an organization during three successive presidential campaigns, reaching its maximum strength in 1880, when its candidate for President, Gen. James B. Weaver, of Iowa, polled over 300,000 votes.

The Sherman Act of 1890, which one writer has felicitously described as a "concession born of political timidity," brought forth a twin brother to the greenback by creating the Treasury notes, with the same provisions as to their legal-tender qualities and reissuance. They were to be issued to pay for four and a half million ounces of silver, which the law directed the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase each month. Under this law one hundred and fifty-seven millions of these Treasury notes were placed by the side of the greenbacks, with nothing for them to lean upon except the silver bullion so purchased and the reserve set aside for the redemption of the greenbacks.

Under fair financial skies no trouble was occasioned, but when pinching times came in 1893 there came with them a feeling of apprehension that unless the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act were repealed the convertibility of the greenbacks was endangered and the country would soon be on a silver standard.

Few have forgotten the memorable struggle in the special session of the Fifty-third Congress, called together in August by President Cleveland for the express purpose of repealing this purchasing clause. It was a struggle replete with sensational and dramatic incidents, from the ringing message of the President to the final repeal three months later over the negative votes of a majority of the President's own party.

Provision was made in 1900 for the retirement and cancellation of the Treasury notes of 1890 as fast as silver dollars were coined, and they have all disappeared from circulation, except $3,388,000, which are shown to be outstanding by the Treasury statement to-day.

To-day the stability of the greenbacks is amply assured, fortified as they are by the one hundred and fifty millions of gold held in the Treasury as a reserve under the gold-standard act of 1900; and they seem to be reasonably secure in the affections of the people, although the charge is laid against them that they are unscientific and should be supplanted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am not a currency expert, and if I was one I could not make much of a statement in regard to this important measure in three minutes; but I desire to express my views on this bill briefly.

The first Panama bonds were 2 per cent bonds, but for some reason or other which seemed good and sufficient to the Committee on Ways and Means and the House, in the Payne Tariff Act of August 5, 1909, we provided for an additional issue of two hundred and ninety millions of 3 per cent bonds. Eighty-four millions were issued of the 2 per cent bonds. Now, I do not understand what has occurred since the legislation of August 5, 1909, to make it wise to amend in the way proposed that legislation. We should have understood the effect on the Government credit when we passed the legislation. I think this legislation is unwise, first, because it is very unwise and very dangerous to begin to differentiate in the matter of Government bonds touching the circulation privilege.

Second, I do not believe that the issue of a 3 per cent bond would affect the market value of the 2 per cent bonds outstanding unless it be the unfortunate fact, which I do not believe to be true, that the country is in such a condition that we can not sell a bond for what it is worth. It is true that there is outstanding some $200,000,000 of bonds which may be used for circulation, and it is assumed that the market has been saturated with bonds having the circulalation privilege and that we do not need any further bonds for circulation purposes. Well, that is assuming we are always to have the present condition. We have an emergency currency provision of law in contemplation of conditions when we may want to expand our currency, and if that legislation was wise when passed, and is still wise, I think it is well to have an anchor to windward in the matter of additional bonds which may be made the basis of circulation.

The latter is certainly the better as the basis of an expanding currency, rather than to call upon the very questionable law which we passed to provide for emergencies. So it seems to me that, first, we took the action we did in the matter of the Panama bonds with our eyes open and understanding conditions, and that there have been no changes to warrant this modification of law; second, we are embarking upon a very questionable policy when we depart from the practice of having the circulation privilege apply to all Government bonds.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I have been surprised that so little has been said of any weight in favor of this extraordinary proposition. I had supposed, when I began to listen to the argument, that there must be cogent and important reasons why this important and revolutionary step to blacklist this big bond issue should be taken. I realized that the banking interests of the country were strongly in favor of it, but I did not assume they were in favor of it, as now appears from the debate, simply for the purpose of giving them practically a monopoly of the bonds that may be used for the purpose of securing circulation.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has called our attention to the fact that during the recent past there has been a rapid increase particularly in the West and South in the number of national banks. That increase will go on, if given an opportunity, but I want to tell the House that that increase can not go on if by an act of Congress the bonds which can be used for the purpose of securing circulation are limited to those already authorized and monopolized by existing banks. I want to tell the House that three or four hundred national banks can not be organized every year hereafter, as has been done in recent years, if, when the organizers of those banks go into the market to buy bonds for the purpose of securing their circulation, they find that all the bonds that may be used for that purpose are already owned by the national banks of the country and held at a premium, as they will be.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska know what percentage of increase there is in the national bank capitalization every year?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not familiar with the figures at the present time, but I understand that about 300 new national banks are organized every year in the natural course of the growth of the country and that these banks must buy bonds to secure circulation. We now have 7,200 national banks, and those banks practically own at the present time all of the bonds available for national-bank circulation. What are the new banks to do; how are they to get the bonds upon which to issue circulation if, hereafter, bonds to be issued shall not be available as security for bank notes?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The gentleman from Connecticut states that it would take 25 years at the natural increase for the national banks to absorb the bonds we have already issued.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the gentleman is mistaken. There are at the present time only $72,000,000 worth of 2 per cent bonds that are not being used by banks for that purpose, and I want to tell the gentleman that those bonds are quoted in the market at a premium of 1 per cent in the New York papers this morning. If they bring a premium of 1 per cent now, what premium will they bring if this legislation is passed and Congress gives a practical monopoly of bank-note security privilege to the present holders of those bonds? They will undoubtedly rise to a high premium. That is the purpose of this legislation—first, to restrict the organization of new banks; second, to restrict the issuance of the circulating medium; and, third, to increase the premium on these bonds.

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask a question. What are you going to do with the $142,000,000 threes and fours that are equally available for circulation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not going to do anything with them.

Mr. HILL. I do not think anybody is, and that is the reason there is no necessity——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They take care of themselves. There are few of them. They will gradually be retired. Here in this bill we have a proposition to blacklist the future bond issues of the United States; here is a proposition, by discriminating against these bonds, to make necessary a higher rate of interest in order to sell them. The Secretary of the Treasury already has the power to issue bonds at 2 per cent with this circulation privilege. Why does he not exercise that privilege? He says the market is saturated. How can he prove the market is saturated when these bonds are selling at a premium of 1 per cent? How can you prove that the market is saturated when Government 2 percents now sell in the open market at a premium of 1 per cent?

Mr. HILL. New York City bonds sold less than a month ago—$60,000,000 of them—bearing 4¼ per cent interest, at less than 1 per cent premium. How can you sell 2 per cent bonds at par?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from New York whether he expects to have more than one speech in closing.

Mr. PAYNE. Two.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I will ask the gentleman to use some of his time.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND].

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me unfortunate that a question of such great importance as the one now before the House should seem to be put to the judgment of the House mainly from the standpoint of whether the banks will make or lose some money by the transaction. To my mind that is a very small part of the question presented for us to determine.

Although, Mr. Speaker, it seems clear to me that from that standpoint alone this bill should pass, it seems to me that as a matter of fairness to the customers of the United States who have purchased their securities—and they at present are mainly the banks, and mainly the banks because the securities of the country have been sold below the credit of the country—upon that standpoint alone we should not inflict loss needlessly and deliberately upon the customers of the United States. These 2 per cent bonds have gone down in the last few years in an amount equal to $30,000,000; that has been charged off by the banks holding them, except ten or eleven millions still carried in the last report as premium. The Comptroller of the Currency has steadily required every bank that holds these bonds to charge off constantly a portion of their premium value. As I say, it seems to me, if we merely regard it from the standpoint of selling more bonds, it will be unwise for Congress needlessly and deliberately to inflict this great loss upon the holders of these bonds. There seems to be no question, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill should pass the 2 per cent bonds of the United States will go down, not all at once, but go down as the years go by until they reach at least 90, and probably lower. No gentleman can doubt this who is familiar with bond issues of this Government or the bonds of the city of New York which have been referred to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VREELAND. I will.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact while the banks may have lost some premiums upon these bonds they have made large sums by their privilege to issue their circulation upon them, and the transaction as a whole has been profitable, as the dividends show?

Mr. VREELAND. I think that is true, I will say to the gentleman. I think if we figure out the money they have been able to make on circulation that they have made money, or come out even, but that of course depends upon many other things, but I think upon the whole transaction up to date there will be no loss in that respect. But the banks should make something out of the money they invest in bonds——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. VREELAND. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is the privilege to issue bonds as a basis for circulation a valuable privilege?

Mr. VREELAND. It will not be considered a valuable privilege in the years to come if this bill is passed because the profit is very small and so much uncertainty would exist as to whether any profit at all would accrue that banks will keep their circulation down to the minimum.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not in point of fact that it was for the reason of increasing the sale value of the bond, that the privilege was given to it? Is not that true?

Mr. VREELAND. Originally?

Mr. SHERLEY. Originally.

Mr. VREELAND. I do not wish to say no to the whole question. That was a part of the purpose. Of course, I can not go into that now. The primary purpose, as the gentleman will find in reading the debates of Congress and reports of the Secretary of the Treasury at that time, was to furnish a national system of money with which to pay the troops of the United States—to create a national currency. But I can not go into that part of the discussion.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the purpose of my inquiry is to ask you, if we take away this privilege from the 3 per cent bonds, do we not to a certain extent reduce their sale value in the market?

Mr. VREELAND. I will say frankly that I do not believe we do. We will realize as much as we are likely to receive, with circulation right included, because by our action we shall deal a blow to the credit of the country.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not true that in the past we have, by giving the privilege, increased the sale value of other Government bonds?

Mr. VREELAND. We undoubtedly have in the past.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then you think the rule of the past will not be the rule of the future?

Mr. VREELAND. I have answered the gentleman's question. I was saying that anyone familiar with bonds and their issue in this country must know that the issue of these bonds will drive down the price of the 2 per cent bonds to at least 90; that is, 10 per cent below par. We only need to look at the issue of bonds in the great city of New York, which a few years ago was issuing 3 per cent bonds, then 3½ per cent bonds, and now it is issuing 4½ per cent bonds. The earlier bonds have gone down and down until they are worth only about 85 on the market, bonds for which a premium was paid when they were purchased.

But I will say, gentlemen, that I do not consider that an important part of this question. The fact is that if we choose to inflict this loss of 75, 80, or 90 millions on the banks of the country, my judgment is that they are able to stand it. They have not appeared in the hearings here. They can absorb that loss, if we choose to put it upon them. My contention is that that is one of the least of the questions involved in this discussion. The question is, How will the credit of the United States be affected?

The next great question is, What will be the effect on the business of the country and on the banking and currency system of the country if we permit our already redundant bank-note circulation to be increased by several hundred millions of dollars or more of national-bank notes, which will be crowded into the channels of business, whether there is need for them or not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a limit upon the amount of bank circulation that can be issued in addition to the amount of bonds outstanding, is there not? It is regulated by the capital or unimpaired surplus of the banks, is it not?

Mr. VREELAND. But the capital of national banks is over $1,000,000,000; that is $300,000,000 more than the present circulation of banks; so that question is not pertinent. It leaves it open for these new bonds to be turned into national-bank circulation. I will ask the gentleman if the people of the United States want to see their bonds go down, and down, until they reach 90 cents on the dollar? I will ask, furthermore, if they realize the fact that, in case these bonds go down, it becomes the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to require of the banks of the country to put up additional security for the $700,000,000 of bank circulation which now exists? I ask the gentlemen how they would think the people would view it, if we pass an act whereby it takes $1.10 of the bonds of the United States to support as credit one of the paper dollars issued by the national banks of the country. It seems to me that the first great question involved is the credit of the United States. I have said here, and I say it unhesitatingly, that, in my judgment, the Treasury will receive as much money for these bonds if this bill passes as it will if it does not pass.

It seems to me it would make those who might desire to buy United States bonds afraid of the bonds of the United States, because they would be afraid to invest their money in bonds when, overnight, by the passage of a law, their value might be dropped down from par to less than 90 cents on a dollar. Mr. Speaker, what connection should there be between digging the Panama Canal and issuing $300,000,000 of bonds to pay for it and forcing $300,000,000 more of paper money into the channels of the business of the United States? What sort of a system of currency is that? Gentlemen are treating the issuance of $290,000,000 more of bank circulation, if these bonds are issued, as merely incidental to this discussion. Why, gentlemen, if to-day in any of the great countries across the sea—in France, in Germany—the proposition were made to increase the paper circulation by $100,000,000 even, it would be a question that would be deliberated upon by the finance minister, by the Government. It would be brought up in the Parliaments of those countries. It would be discussed long and carefully as to the effect on their financial systems and upon the business of their country. And yet we, lightly and carelessly, incidentally, as a mere side issue in the passage of a bill authorizing the sale of bonds——

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VREELAND (continuing). Of the United States are deliberately injecting into our currency possibly $290,000,000 of paper money. I regret that I can not yield to the gentleman until I am through.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] yields three minutes more.

Mr. VREELAND. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that some Members think that if we have more bank circulation the people in their districts can borrow it at lower rates of interest. But I want you to take this into consideration: Very likely the issuance of this great mass of additional bank-note circulation does not mean that we will have more money in the United States. It means, rather, that we will have poorer money in the United States. All of you, gentlemen, are familiar with the fact that when we push out more money than is needed for the business of the country, more of this bank-note circulation, it pushes out the gold that we have, and it flies away to some country where it is more needed.

I call attention to the fact that during the last two years, while our bank-note circulation has steadily increased, we have made a net loss of gold exported of more than $135,000,000. Why, gentlemen, our bank-note circulation has more than doubled in the last seven years. It has gone up from a little over $300,000,000 to over $700,000,000. We all know that the great fault of our financial system to-day—one of the great faults—is that there is no present connection between the demands of business and the amount of bank notes that we push into the channels of business.

This action here to-day illustrates one great fault in our system. We all know that the amount of circulation issued by banks depends, not upon the needs of business, but depends almost entirely upon the price of United States bonds on the market and upon whether the banks can make more money by issuing more circulation than by issuing less circulation.

Now, gentlemen, it is well known to all students of this question, to all business men—and all economists agree in the opinion—that we shall never have a system suitable for our needs until the circulation of money is disassociated from bonds; until the circulation depends on the needs of the business of the country; until it shall come out when more money is needed in the fall and go back when less money is needed in the spring.

We may disagree about the best plan for accomplishing this purpose, but I say that opinion in the country is unanimous that we must dissociate bonds from our circulating medium and connect them with the needs of the business interests of the country.

Already this great sum of $700,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds, with circulation depending upon it, is one of the great obstacles in the road of accomplishing any banking and currency reform, and from that standpoint alone I say that we ought not to make this problem more difficult by adding $200,000,000 more of bond-secured circulation to our already redundant issue.

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that there will be only one more speech on this side.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a very important bill, and that a quorum ought to be present.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point of no quorum present?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The point is sustained.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. The roll call shows that there are 290 Members present—a quorum.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I give two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT].

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, the brief limit of time granted does not permit of a discussion of the question involved, and I will confine my remarks to a single observation.

It is practically conceded that the 2 per cent bonds were enhanced in value through Government action. It is also conceded that if the Panama bonds are used as a basis of circulation the effect will be to depress the 2 per cent bonds below par. In other words, the Government having given to the 2 per cent bonds an enhanced or artificial value, it is now urged that converse action ought to be taken or permitted which would have the effect of depreciating the value of the bonds below par. I do not believe in legislation the effect of which will be to place obligations of the Government below par, which seems to be the status if this measure is not passed. I have never stood for any legislation which I believed would directly or indirectly amount to a repudiation of our obligations. [Applause.]

While this will not be the direct result if we fail to pass the pending bill, it will at least be the effect. It seems to me there is a moral obligation Congress can not ignore. In view of circumstances with which you are familiar it does not seem to me that the proposition is a debatable one or that the House should hesitate to pass this measure. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 15 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT] says that he will not vote for legislation that will in effect depreciate the outstanding securities of the United States. He is not asked to do anything of the kind. Nobody has proposed legislation to depreciate securities now outstanding. The law now authorizes the issuance of two hundred and ninety millions of Panama bonds. If the Secretary of the Treasury were properly to discharge his duty he would issue them at the rate of interest he believes advisable up to the limit permitted by law, and obtain the best price he could for them in the market. But the effect of this bill will be to fasten the hold of certain great national banks upon the Treasury Department, and to perpetuate a deplorable and shameful situation.

In 1900 the so-called gold standard act was passed. In that act certain refunding schemes were authorized, and authority was given to refund certain 5, 4, and 3 per cent bonds by the issuance of 2 per cent bonds in their place. The act provided that the Secretary of the Treasury might redeem those outstanding bonds at a valuation not greater than their then present worth so that they would yield an income of 2½ per cent per annum; but in order to make the refunding proposition more palatable to the national banks the then law was changed so as to permit the banks to use bonds of the United States to secure circulation up to the par value of the bonds instead of up to 90 per cent, as the law then provided.

The cause for the refunding proposition was that the 5, 4, and 3 per cent bonds were rapidly becoming due and the Treasury at that time was overflowing with money. Its revenues were largely in excess of its expenditures and the Treasury Department was redeeming the outstanding obligations of the Government. Suddenly it was realized that if the Treasury continued to pay off the outstanding bonded debt of the United States there would be no basis for the circulation of the national banks; widespread alarm was awakened among the banking interests and efforts made to protect their circulation. The result was the refunding scheme, by which 2 per cent 30-year bonds were to be exchanged for our then outstanding and almost due obligations.

Gentlemen talk about depreciating the securities held by the banks. Let me read you how they operated under the refunding proposition. Under the first circular issued by the Treasury Department, under the law of 1900, over four hundred and forty-five millions of 2 per cent bonds were issued at par in exchange for outstanding fives, fours, and threes. Let me read from the testimony of one who benefited by the process how the scheme was conducted:

> I was connected with one of these banks and am still, and have a great interest in it. I telegraphed our correspondent right after the act was passed to purchase $250,000 in those bonds. The currency against these bonds issued as currency against this particular bank was used to pay for the purchase of the bonds, less a small item of premium, and thereafter and since that time this bank has been saving 2 per cent on the bonds substantially without any investment whatever. The bonds yield about 1½ per cent net, and as the national banks are getting the interest on over $700,000,000 of bonds which cost the banks nothing, or a negligible amount, they have abused the confidence of their friends in claiming to have been buncoed.

In other words, these banks, under the refunding scheme, arranged to obtain a certain number of 2 per cent bonds; by taking out an equal amount of circulation it was necessary to pay only the trifling sum required to equalize values, or for commissions, in effecting the exchanges, and by issuing their notes without interest, upon which a tax of one-half of 1 per cent was paid, they obtained in return bonds to the same amount, upon which they received 2 per cent interest. Ever since then the transaction has netted them 1½ per cent interest annually on the par value of the bonds, for which they have been compelled practically to invest nothing.

Mr. WEEKS. I did not understand what authority the gentleman was reading from.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am reading from a speech by a Senator, made in the United States Senate, and not challenged by any of the distinguished financiers in that body. It was during the session of Congress when the postal savings-bank bill was under discussion—the session just ended.

Mr. WEEKS. Who was it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. OWEN—largely interested in the national bank which purchased these bonds in this manner. The gentleman laughs. Perhaps the gentleman comes from a community where his banks were not sufficiently sharp to engage in such an enterprise; perhaps the institutions with which he is familiar may have bought their bonds of the New York and Oklahoma bankers who were so much more keen and informed about the banking business than the gentlemen whom he represents. Nobody professes that the national banks have been fooled in this operation.

Two other circulars have been issued by the Treasury Department under which refunding operations have been conducted. So profitable was the exchange of bonds to the national banks that, under the circular issued in March, 1903, for additional refunding operations, although in 1900 the 2 per cent bonds had been exchanged at par, the Treasury Department was able later to issue and exchange them on a bisis of 102, and eighty-one millions of them at that price were issued in March, 1903; in September, 1903, fifty millions more were exchanged at 102. In 1905 fifty-three millions were exchanged at 101.

I know some gentlemen have said to me that the national banks have already sustained a great loss. But they are unduly alarmed, and laboring under a misapprehension. All of the operations under the refunding act have been highly profitable to the national banks. They eagerly seized the opportunity to obtain 30-year 2 per cent bonds under the highly favorable conditions for their rapidly maturing fives, fours, and threes.

It may be, however, that some of the smaller and more recently organized banks were shorn by the skillful men in charge of the larger and stronger banks.

At some time after the refunding operations were initiated the Secretary of the Treasury made it known that he was prepared to deposit some fifty or seventy-five millions of dollars in the national banks, and that Government bonds would be required as security for those deposits. Some of the banks rushed into the market to obtain bonds to enable them to obtain deposits, and very probably had unloaded on them by those banks which engaged in the profitable refunding operations some of the 2 per cent bonds.

In some instances as high as 109 was paid for them. In a short time, through the operations of our indefensible appropriations, our surplus greatly dwindled, and it was necessary to withdraw these deposits from the banks. It was then that the innocent national-bank lambs found themselves with some securities on their hands that were not quite as useful and as valuable and as desirable as they had been led to believe. But the original parties to the refunding scheme sat back and laughed and waited and have probably bought back these unloaded bonds at greatly reduced prices.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] spoke about inflating our currency by $300,000,000 through the issuing of two hundred and ninety millions of these bonds, with the right to use them for circulation privileges. There is not much danger of the bank circulation being inflated for any such reason. The gentleman overlooked the fact that while there are seven hundred and thirty-five millions of our outstanding bonds deposited in the Treasury to secure circulation, a balance up to nine hundred and twelve millions is still available for circulation, and that there has been no extraordinary desire on the part of banks to obtain and use these bonds, and by their use to increase the now outstanding circulation. Upon what does he base his assertion that a bond issue increases the circulation? Who is threatening to do so? Whence is there a demand for it? Who can profit by it? The statement is preposterous. There are nearly two hundred millions of bonds available for the purpose of increasing circulation not so used, but nobody is attempting to use them for any such purpose.

Mr. VREELAND. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the doubling of the bank-note circulation in six years and a half is a measure of inflation which ought to be avoided if possible.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That does not follow as a matter of course.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no indication that there will be any such inflation; but, after all, Mr. Speaker, that leads to the point I wish to reach in this discussion. Gentlemen have overlooked the important point in this entire discussion; have missed the question of first importance to us. Because of the condition of the Treasury, the Treasury Department finds it imperative to issue a certain number of bonds in order to obtain money to pay our current obligations.

That is the object of selling the bonds at this time. The working balance in the Treasury is between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury asserts that within a very short time he must sell bonds in order to replenish the Treasury. He has authority to issue bonds up to $200,000,000 to reimburse the Treasury to the extent that expenditures have been made for the construction of the Panama Canal. We have already issued $84,000,000 of such bonds at 2 per cent, and have expended something over $200,000,000 in the construction of the canal. There is at least $125,000,000 which may be reimbursed by the sale of bonds for canal construction. The prime purpose of issuing these bonds is to obtain money to replenish the Treasury. What is the important thing for us to look at? Are we to be interested chiefly in those who have been speculating in United States bonds heretofore, or are we to take such action as will result in the largest possible price being received for the bonds about to be sold? Is our interest and duty to protect the Treasury and the people, or the bondholders and the banks? In other words, are we to look to the interests of the people, or are we to look to the interests of some banks who either have made advantageous or foolish investments?

Mr. REEDER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. REEDER. If it is true that all the gentleman from New York is looking after is to make the bonds produce as much as possible and get the money into the Treasury, why not put into this law a provision that the bonds used for circulation shall not be used and these alone shall be used for circulation? That would make these sell at about 4 per cent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That would be just as fair to the people as to pass this bill, with its resulting advantage, is to the banks. There is no difference at all in principle.

Mr. REEDER. If the gentleman concedes it would make a good deal more money in the sale of these bonds, then on your theory you ought to favor it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am in favor of getting the highest possible price for our obligations. When bonds are sold, under any circumstances, it is unfortunate for the country. If bonds must be sold and the future mortgaged, it should be under as little onerous conditions as possible. Some gentlemen may be oversolicitous for the bondholders. In my opinion, our duty is to the Treasury and to the people. That is the side I prefer to advocate. No one will be able to escape the consequences of his action upon this question. A choice must be made between the people and the bond-holding banks. This bond issue is authorized in the act of August 4, 1909. Nobody dreamed at that time of putting a restriction upon the issue for circulation purposes. What has happened since? All should remember that certain important financial interests in this country are quietly and industriously and persistently working to secure a very drastic change in our monetary laws. They have in mind the desire to control the financial operations not only of the Treasury, but of the country. There was never a suggestion that any bank had lost a dollar on these refunding schemes until the postal-savings act came up for consideration in the Senate. Then when a provision was inserted to permit the use of the funds acquired through the operations of the postal savings-bank act for the purchase of outstanding bonds we commenced to hear much about the injustice that would be done to the national banks if the outstanding twos were not protected.

Did it ever occur to this House that opposition to the postal-savings system from powerful banks suddenly ceased? That opposition stopped when certain provisions were inserted in the bill to compel the application of the proceeds of postal-savings bonds to the redemption at par of outstanding bonds of the United States subject to call.

The next step to fasten the hold of the national banks upon the Treasury is this bill.

National banks are being organized continuously. They are required to invest in a certain amount of United States bonds. They need bonds to secure circulation. This bill fixes definitely the present outstanding bonds of $912,000,000 as the limit of bonds available for such purposes. The twos are selling to-day at 101.

The enactment of this bill will have a twofold effect. It will lessen the value of the $290,000,000 of Panama bonds to be issued and compel them to be issued at a higher rate than otherwise, and it will greatly enhance the value of the outstanding twos. This bill, if enacted, enriches the bondholding banks at the expense of the people. I venture to predict that within six months the price of our outstanding 2 per cent bonds will be much greater than at present. Why such solicitude for the banks, when the Treasury is depleted? Why not some thought for the protection of the Treasury?

It has been asserted that the failure to enact this bill will depreciate the bonds now outstanding. Suppose it should do so. Will anyone assert that the Government is bound to legislate so as to maintain at par its bonds? The same logic would require us to refrain from issuing any additional bonds whatever, since every additional bond issued increases by so much the obligations of the Government and lessens the security of the present bondholder.

Had I time I should discuss some other phases of this entire subject. I view, however, with suspicion a bill of such far-reaching effect upon our entire financial system submitted in the rush and hurry of the closing days of the session, and passed through one House without any discussion and crowded upon us here without adequate time for sufficient analysis and consideration.

Let me, however, call attention to one phase of the question which, because of my duties in connection with the appropriation bills, I have not had time to consider sufficiently to appreciate and determine the anxiety for this legislation.

Practically all of the 5, 4, and 3 per cent bonds have matured or will mature within a very few years.

The 2 per cents issued under the act of 1900 are 30-year bonds and will mature in about 20 years. The $84,000,000 of Panama bonds heretofore issued are redeemable 10 years after issue, and will be subject to call before the twos issued under the act of 1900.

But, Mr. Speaker, the $290,000,000 of bonds authorized under section 39 of the Payne-Aldrich Act (approved August 5, 1909) may bear interest at not exceeding 3 per cent and are redeemable 50 years from the date of issue. None of these bonds have yet been issued. Long-term bonds, capable of paying up to 3 per cent interest, they should not be made unavailable for a purpose for which all other Government bonds are applicable. Not more than 12 months ago the Treasury Department accepted certain State, municipal, and other securities as security for deposits in place of Government bonds because they were unobtainable. No one can foretell accurately what the necessities of the future will require. It is little less than criminal for the Congress deliberately to act in such a manner as to impair the value of Government securities about to be sold for the purpose of replenishing the Treasury solely to protect bond-holding banks from possible loss.

The issue here is plain. It is the people against the banks; the Treasury against the bond speculators; the welfare of the many against the selfish interests of the few. Such a choice must be made. It can not be evaded. Those who vote for this bill do so with full knowledge of its purpose and effect. I hope it will not pass, but that it will be defeated; that the Treasury, where the people's interests are, and not the bond-holding banks, where the interests of the speculators in the Government's credit centers, will be safeguarded. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I want to state in a word what this proposition means. We have authorized an issue of $290,000,000, in round numbers, of Panama bonds, at a maximum rate of 3 per cent. About $90,000,000—somewhat less than $90,000,000—have been issued, leaving an authorization of $200,000,000 available. More than $100,000,000 has been spent on the Panama Canal in addition to the amount provided by the bonds issued, and the purpose of this act is to determine the rate of interest and form of the bonds to be issued in future. We have outstanding $867,793,630 of bonds. Of these, $98,713,400 are 4 per cent bonds issued in 1895, coming due in 1925; $641,768,950 more are 2 per cent bonds, due in 1930, issued under the act of March, 1900, and they are the result of refunding operations; $84,231,940 are Panama twos; and $43,079,340 are threes due in 1918, but callable since 1908. The bonds which are generally used for circulation purposes by the banks are the fours and the twos, the reason being that, except the Panama twos, they have a definite date of maturity.

Now, the only question for this House to consider is how these bonds shall be issued. Undoubtedly rates of interest are increasing the world over. The little community where I live issued about 10 years ago 3 per cent bonds on a 2.95 per cent basis. We are now selling bonds on a 3½ per cent basis. All first-grade bonds have advanced in about the same ratio, and the 2 per cent bond, with the circulation privilege behind it, acceptable though it may have been when issued, is not now attractive to anyone, and bonds will have to bear even a higher rate of interest to be sold to the public or to the banks.

We provided in the postal savings bank bill that depositors could exchange their deposits for 2½ per cent bonds, and there was grave doubt in the minds of many Members of this House whether that rate was high enough, whether it should not be made 2¾ or even 3 per cent; but a saving clause was added that that bond could be presented and paid at par, and therefore, the depositor in the savings bank would be protected in the market value of his investment. There are other reasons than the consideration of the circulation privilege, which bear on the issuing of these bonds. In the first place, from the standpoint of most men who have considered financial matters it seems wise to get our national debt into the hands of the people rather than have it concentrated in the banks.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. KOPP. Can the gentleman state how these bonds will be given to the public?

Mr. WEEKS. I assume they will be given to the public at the best price at which they can be sold.

Mr. KOPP. With no limitation as to whom——

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know about that.

Mr. KOPP. I am favorable toward the proposition, but there are some things I want cleared up. Will these bonds be callable?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not understand so.

Mr. KOPP. Now, then, if they are all issued, or practically so, how can they be used by the Government for paying postal savings depositors or exchanging postal savings deposits for the bonds?

Mr. WEEKS. The trustees of the postal savings banks have a right to invest in any Government bond, twos, threes, or fours, or whatever rate it may bear, but the depositor in the postal savings bank has only the privilege of exchanging his deposit for a 2½ per cent bond, which has not the circulating privilege.

Now, I must go on. I would like to know how much time I have remaining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. WEEKS. What I was saying, Mr. Speaker, was this, that it is desirable to get these bonds into the hands of the people, and usual and proper means will be used for that purpose. It makes a better citizen of a man if he has a United States bond, for it gives him a personal interest in his Government, even if it is not more than a $20 bond; and it is desirable from that standpoint that we distribute these bonds rather than to have them go into the hands of the banks. This policy has been followed for many years in France with most satisfactory results. It is said that more than 4,000,000 French citizens own Government bonds.

Now, as to the circulation privilege. We have $35 per capita of circulation in this country, which is the largest per capita circulation of any nation in the world. There is no desire or need for more, and the only reason that circulation is not reduced is because the banks have these 2 per cent bonds on hand, and they can not sell any great quantity of them and retire the circulation. It has been correctly stated to-day that the country is saturated with circulation, and we would be better off with less rather than more; but to add to that the possibility of $200,000,000 more would result in depreciating our currency and would drive gold out of the country.

My friend from Tennessee Mr. SIMS talks about the "Money Trust." But national banks do not make abnormal profits, which is proven by the statement that the national banks are not increasing in number in proportion to the increase in other banks. The proportion is more than two to one of State banks as compared with the national banks, and the capital going into State banks is in about the same ratio. My friend from New York [Mr. VREELAND], for instance, is the president of a State bank, not a national bank. Undoubtedly, he would prefer to have a national charter if conditions were equal, but because of the fact that he can make more money as a State banker than as a national banker he takes the State charter. That condition is general throughout the country, and it is the reason why State banks are increasing in number so rapidly, at the expense of national banks.

Some gentlemen have suggested that there is a very large profit to be made out of circulation. This is not a correct statement, for it only varies from three-fourths of 1 per cent to 1¼ per cent. But there are so many restrictions placed upon national banks by the Government, and the profits from circulation are so limited compared with the possibilities of loss on bonds, and so forth, that I do not recall any bank in a large community that is not limiting itself as nearly as possible to its minimum amount of circulation. It must have 25 per cent of its capital invested in Government bonds, and the only way it can get a decent return on that is to issue against them its circulation.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] referred to the statement made by a Senator in debate during the discussion of the postal savings-bank bill. It must have been delivered at one of those times when the Senate Chamber was empty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman was making his speech, and he interrupted.

Mr. WEEKS. Anybody who has a semblance of financial knowledge could make a complete and convincing answer to that statement. The banks exchanged high-rate bonds for 2 per cent bonds. They had their money invested in fives, fours, and threes, which were about to mature. They simply exchanged one class of bonds into another.

And incidentally they wanted to aid the Government in its refunding operations. As a matter of fact the Government saved between $16,000,000 and $17,000,000 in these different refunding operations, which it would not have saved if these bonds had been allowed to come to maturity.

In addition to that, the very fact that the national banks hold these 2 per cent bonds, the fact that the circulation privilege has made a market for them, has enabled the Government to save something like $7,000,000 a year since 1900. If they had been issued on a 3 per cent basis, the Government would have lost the difference between 2 and 3 per cent. Furthermore, the Government has sold all these bonds at a premium, obtaining on each $1,000,000 of twos sold about $40,000 premium, whereas if the bonds had been sold in the open market there would have been received for them between $100,000 and $150,000 less than par on every $1,000,000 of bonds sold.

Now, while I am not contending that it is the duty of the Government to bolster up the national banks, I do contend that it is the duty of the Government to maintain its own credit. The Government of the United States uses the national banks as its fiscal agents. It does its business through them, so far as it can do so. It has cooperated with the banks, and the banks have cooperated with the Government, in placing these bonds whenever it has been found necessary to sell bonds. I understand the last twos sold were taken by the banks on the condition that at that time a certain percentage of the money paid for them should be left on deposit in the banks. As far as I know no bank wanted to take the 2 per cent bonds, either at a premium or at par, and the only reasons for so doing were the possibilities of making something out of the money left on deposit and because they wished to be of service to the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain what effect the issuance of the 3 per cent bonds of the issue of 1898 had upon the 2 per cent bonds?

Mr. WEEKS. There were no twos outstanding at that time.

I want to state to the House what, in my judgment, will happen if we issue these 3 per cent bonds with the circulation privilege attached. The 4 per cent bonds are selling on a 2½ basis, the 3 per cent bonds are selling on a 2¾ per cent basis, and they are selling on that basis because they are callable at any time, and naturally they do not command a high premium. The 2 per cent bonds are selling at about par. If they were sold on a 2½ per cent basis, as the fours are, and as they undoubtedly would sell if we put other bonds on the market bearing a higher rate and having the same privilege, I believe it is safe to say that they would gradually go down to about 90. The banks have already charged off $35,000,000 of loss on account of those bonds, marking them down from 104 or 104½ to par.

Under the law, if security behind circulation decreases in value so that the bonds sell below par, the comptroller calls on the banks for additional security, or to reduce their circulation, or to deposit the cash difference between the price of the bonds and their par value. Therefore if they should decrease in price to 90, which would be about a 2½ per cent basis, it would mean a loss to the banks of the country of $70,000,000, which the banks would have to supply, either with other securities, Government bonds, or in cash. Now, I maintain that it is the duty of Congress to prevent any such condition as that. The banks should not be considered as corporations, but as collections of individuals who own this stock. In the State of Massachusetts, for instance, among the limited investments which our mutual savings banks can make are national-bank stocks. They hold something like $11,000,000 of national-bank stocks. Two millions of the three and a quarter millions population of Massachusetts are depositors in our mutual savings banks. This legislation would directly affect not the interests of "the Money Trust," but in this instance of those 2,000,000 depositors in savings banks, and it would be an element in destroying the credit which we have all taken pride in. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, Mr. UNDERWOOD demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 131, noes 99.

Mr. UNDERWOOD and Mr. MORSE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 169, nays 135, answered "present" 11, not voting 68, as follows:

CONSTRUCTION OF A CANAL IN BERGEN COUNTY, N. J.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 10883) authorizing the Erie Railroad Co. to construct a canal connecting the Hackensack River and Berrys Creek, Bergen County, N. J., as an aid to navigation, and for other purposes, a similar House bill being on the calendar.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Erie Railroad Co., a corporation of the State of New York, its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized, for the purpose of removing perils and delays now incident to the navigation of Berrys Creek, in the county of Bergen and State of New Jersey, through the presence of the bridge of the said Erie Railroad Co. across said creek at a distance of about 8,700 feet from the point where said creek empties into the Hackensack River and of improving the navigation of said Berrys Creek, to construct a suitable canal, from a point in the center of Berrys Creek, northeast of the bridge of the Erie Railroad Co. over said stream, to and into the Hackensack River: Provided, That no canal shall be constructed under this authority unless the plans for the same are approved by the Corps of Engineers and the Secretary of War, who are authorized to impose such conditions as may be necessary to maintain the navigability of Berrys Creek unimpaired. And if said railroad company shall construct said canal to the approval of the Secretary of War, said railroad company shall be authorized and permitted to maintain a fixed bridge over Berrys Creek at a point where the main line of the railroad company now crosses said creek.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A similar House bill (H. R. 32910) on the calendar was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INDEBTEDNESS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 13474) to provide for the payment of the debt of the District of Columbia, and to provide for permanent improvements, and for other purposes, with the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That from and after June 30, 1911, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in determining the estimates of funds available for appropriation for each succeeding fiscal year, shall first provide for and set aside from the estimated District revenues a sufficient sum to meet all estimated and fixed charges required by law to be paid wholly from said revenues, including interest at 3 per cent on the annual balance due the United States on account of advances made to the District of Columbia, and including, further, the sum of $300,000 as a repayment on account of said advances, until the indebtedness of the District of Columbia to the United States shall be extinguished; and the annual estimates of appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, exclusive of the charges aforesaid, and including amounts estimated or to be estimated under any general appropriation bill, shall not exceed in the aggregate a sum equal to twice the amount of the said District revenues then remaining: Provided, That the said commissioners shall allow for the extinguishment of the bonded debt of the District of Columbia out of the combined revenue fund by annually including in their estimates of appropriations a sum equal to the sum heretofore annually appropriated for the interest and sinking fund, namely, $975,408, until the said debt as evidenced by outstanding bonds shall be extinguished: Provided further, That hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall provide in their estimates of appropriations for permanent works of improvement a sum not less than $1,230,000, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and annually thereafter an amount not less than the same sum increased by the sum of $100,000 for each succeeding fiscal year until and including the fiscal year to end June 30, 1924; and said estimates for permanent improvements shall include the reclamation of the Anacostia Flats above the navy-yard bridge, and their conversion into a park or parks; the gradual extension of the park system of the District; the construction of public wharves; the extensions of trunk water and sewer mains into the suburban portions of the District; the elimination of dangerous grade crossings; and such other permanent public works as may be hereafter authorized by Congress from time to time."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SIMS. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules a second is ordered.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended to 40 minutes on a side. This is a very important bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time under the rules, which is 20 minutes on a side, be extended to 40 minutes on a side.

Mr. DALZELL. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that there are at least four or five gentlemen on this side who want to speak.

Mr. DALZELL. But that makes an hour and 20 minutes. I suggest that the gentleman ask for 30 minutes on a side; that will make an hour.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to gentlemen who may want to follow this debate that this bill, as reprinted, can be found at the desk.

In my judgment, this is one of the most important bills that has been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia during this Congress. No one regrets more than myself that we have not had an opportunity to present this bill to the House before this time, but everyone knows that it is because this committee has been denied its time under the rules of the House, so much so that we have not had two full legislative days since the middle of last May, and I further regret that we are obliged to consider this bill under the suspension of the rules, which allows so little time for debate. I have no hesitancy in saying that if this bill could be fairly and fully debated and understood by the Members, it would receive even more than the two-thirds vote required under the suspension of the rules.

This bill, if enacted into law, will accomplish two things: First, it will pay the debt of the District and provide for some needed permanent improvements.

The estimated funded debt of the District on the 30th of June, 1911, will be $8,800,000. The floating debt at that time will be $2,400,000. The estimated funded debt on the 30th of June, 1912, and that is what the estimates have already been made for, will be $8,200,000, and the floating debt will be $1,800,000. The funded debt of the District is the debt owed by the District and the General Government in the form of outstanding bonds, which bear 3.65 per cent. The floating debt of the District is the debt which the District owes to the General Government, and which bears 2 per cent interest. It may be of interest to Members to know that the bonded debt is paid one-half by the United States and one-half by the District. The debt of the District at any one time is determined by adding the floating debt to one-half the bonded debt, or by subtracting the District surplus from one-half the bonded debt. I shall be glad to insert in my remarks a table, and an explanation of the table, showing the actual debt of the District at this time.

[Explanation of table.—Column I, fiscal year; Column II, surplus in Treasury at end of fiscal year standing to credit of District; Column III, floating debt, being balance due the United States by the District at the end of the fiscal year; Column IV, bonded debt outstanding at end of fiscal year, payable half and half; Column V, actual debt of District proper (to wit, one-half of bonded debt, plus the floating debt, or minus the surplus) at end of fiscal year.]

I Fiscal year.	II Surplus in United States Treasury to credit of the District.	III Deficit, balance due United States by District.	IV Bonded debt, balance outstanding, due half by United States and half by District.	V Actual debt, District proper.

[2] Estimated.

D. J. DONOVAN,
Acting Auditor, District of Columbia.

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
January 7, 1911.

You will see that the actual debt of the District proper, estimated on June 30, 1911, is $6,996,000.

I apprehend that in this body there are two schools of financiers, so to speak. There are those who believe that a city like this should never be out of debt, while on the contrary there are those who maintain the debt should be paid as soon as practicable. I find these opposite views entertained by the opponents of this bill. I do not know on this point how they may seek to harmonize their differences. While I do not claim to belong to any school of finance, I believe in paying the debt of this city as well as that of any other city as soon as possible.

I apprehend that if the distinguished Member from New York [Mr. ANDRUS] were to express his opinion, as doubtless he will before this debate is over, it will be shown that he belongs to that school of financiers who believe that the debt of the District ought not to be paid, at least for the present, and certainly his opinion is entitled to great respect, for while he does not often participate in debate he has taken great interest in the affairs of the District, is a wizard in finance, and one of the profound thinkers of the House.

In my opinion, while we are paying the debt of the District, we ought at the same time to provide funds for permanent improvements. The plea is constantly made in this Chamber, when appropriations are being made for the District, that nothing is being done in behalf of the people of the General Government. In other words, under our present system, which is half and half under the organic law beginning with 1878, Members frequently say, What does the General Government, in these appropriations, do for our constituents, and what do our constituents, so to speak, get out of this proposition by which the District contributes one half and the United States the other half. If this bill is enacted into law, when money is raised to carry on the affairs of the District instead of the balance being used for current expenses that balance will be used for permanent improvements, as I insist it should be, and when our constituents come to the Capital City they will see upon every hand something in the form of permanent substantial improvements which would be the result of the one-half that is contributed by the General Government.

I am sure before this debate is concluded some Member or Members will take the position that the United States should no longer contribute one-half. There are Members of this body and their friends who are fortunate enough from time to time to go abroad. We are glad they can. They come back and tell us of the beauties and the glory and the grandeur of Paris, Vienna, Berlin, and other cities; and they must not forget that the Republic of France and the other countries of which these cities are capitals contribute their proportion, as does this Republic to the city of Washington, toward making splendid improvements, which are admired not only by the people of those cities and countries, but by the entire world.

I frankly admit that if the revenues of the District continue to increase as they have been doing in the past the time will come, doubtless, when the organic law will be changed so that the General Government will not contribute as much as it does at this time, but I am sure that no one will contend for a single moment that the time is ripe for such legislation as this.

This bill has been reported from the committee and has been on the calendar for many months. It has been the subject of much discussion in the newspapers of this city and before the chamber of commerce and the board of trade and in other ways, and as a result we have had an opportunity to learn of some of the objections that have been offered, and especially by Members who no doubt will participate in the debate.

First. Some gentlemen complain of the form of government for the District and say that this must be changed before this legislation is passed. I want to say to you that, in my judgment, the present form of government is established for many years to come, and whether you agree with me or not, I have no hesitancy in saying that under the present form of government the city of Washington is the best-governed city in this Republic.

Second. Others are dissatisfied with the law as to the assessment of personal property and insist that it should be remedied. I agree with all such and want to call attention to the fact that upon the calendar of the District of Columbia we have had for months a bill to tax intangible property, yet I have no hesitancy in saying to the Members of the House that if we had time now or had had weeks ago to pass this bill, as we doubtless could, through this body and it had gone to the other end of the Capitol it would have slept where the bill for taxing inheritances sleeps, and you all remember that this bill took a whole District day. I refer to the bill which was introduced and so ably presented by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]. So I say we can hardly afford to wait until legislation of this character is passed, for, as much as you and I may desire it, no one can foretell when such legislation will be enacted into law.

These, briefly, are some of the objections that are made. Let us see if we can not agree on some things in the bill that are stated under the head of permanent improvements. I doubt if there is a Member who is not in favor of giving to the people of the District additional suburban trunk sewers and an extension of trunk water mains, to the end that the people of Anacostia, Tennallytown, and other portions of the District may have the same. Provision is made in this bill for 25 miles of suburban trunk sewers and 40 miles of extensions of trunk water mains, and I have heard no one contend that they would not be needed by the time, under the provisions of this bill, when the money will be available to pay for them. Is there anyone here that is not in favor of doing away with railroad grade crossings? The time is past when there is any longer any difference of opinion among the people or even among the railroad companies upon this proposition. It is in the interest of human life, if for nothing else.

Even our constituents who visit the National Capital are in favor of appropriating money for the doing away of that eyesore, that disturber of public health, to the end that the Anacostia Flats may be improved; and in so doing this is only one link in that chain of permanent improvements which are outlined in this book which I hold in my hand, entitled "Improvement of the Park System of the District of Columbia," the result of the labors of a commission authorized by Congress, and composed of Burnham, St. Gaudens, Olmstead, and McKim, men eminent in their profession, and which was obtained at a cost of $70,000. The question is, Shall we make use of and take advantage at this time of the labors of these gentlemen?

But, gentlemen, the most serious bone of contention in this bill is undoubtedly that portion of it which seeks to own and control the link between Rock Creek Park and Potomac Park, and it is to this question for a moment I desire to address myself. I hold in my hand Senate Document No. 458, Sixtieth Congress, first session, "Report upon improvement of valley of Rock Creek from Massachusetts Avenue to mouth of the creek," and want to call your attention to page 8 of this report which, without objection, I will insert in my remarks, and for the moment I wish each of you had this page before you.

NOTE.—Engineering and contingencies included in total.

It is only an estimate of the expense that is to be incurred if this improvement is to be made, and there are gentlemen who insist that it is too much. Let us see. From Massachusetts Avenue to P Street there are 2,490,733 square feet land (including improvements), estimated at $1,061,386. From P to L Street there are 1,261,827 square feet land (including improvements), estimated at $860,351, making a total of 3,752,560 square feet, estimated at $1,921,737, approximately $0.50 per square foot. Who is there that is familiar with this territory and surrounding country that will say that this number of square feet, with the improvements which are already on it, is not worth approximately $0.50 per square foot?

But I want to be fair in the discussion of this matter, and so will add that there are those who insist that the estimated total cost of $4,739,806 is too much for this number of square feet with the improvements which are already on the same and the improvements which are to be put upon it in accordance with the plans for the "Improvement of the park system of the District of Columbia"—in round numbers, 75 cents per square foot. I doubt if some gentlemen who are opposing this proposition, and who so far have only casually considered it, will further investigate the matter, if they even will think that 75 cents per square foot is far out of the way. And in this connection I want to call your attention to the number of bridges and their estimated cost which of necessity must be built across Rock Creek whether this bill is enacted into law or not. Their estimated cost amounts to hundreds of thousands of dollars.

But, gentlemen, this question of the cost of land when improvements are to be made in the District is no new one. It is ever with us. When I came to Congress 14 years ago they were completing that splendid structure, the Congressional Library. I heard it said many times then that too much was paid for the land upon which the Congressional Library stands. Who is there here to-day that has not heard complaints about the price which was paid for the land upon which the House Office Building stands, and so with the Senate Office Building. This is equally true of the land on which the splendid municipal building on Pennsylvania Avenue stands. One morning a few years ago we woke up and found that the old power house which stood on this land had burned, and for months we were drawn about the city by mules. Later on this land was purchased for the municipal building, and again I repeat, Who is there that has not heard complaints that too much was paid for this property? Recently the Government purchased squares at the corner of Pennsylvania Avenue and Fifteenth Street, upon which are to be erected three buildings—the Department of Justice, Department of Commerce and Labor, and the Department of State. Already criticisms and complaints are heard that too much has been paid for the land, and so, in my judgment, it will ever be, not only here but elsewhere, as long as improvements continue to be made.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Does the gentleman desire not to be interrupted?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to answer questions, but I do want to reserve time for other Members.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. There are some of us very desirous of light on this subject. Is it the understanding of the gentleman that if this bill passes it would authorize the construction of these various projects, and it would leave it entirely discretionary with the commissioners?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no. The bill as reported does not confer additional power on the commissioners, but rather enjoins them:

First. To limit their estimates to the combined revenues, whereas until last year they have been in the habit of submitting estimates exceeding by millions of dollars the anticipated revenues.

Second. To include in their estimates provision for payment of the debt, whereas preceding last year it has been the habit of the commissioners, in connection with their estimates, to seek to borrow large sums annually in the way of advances from the United States Treasury.

Third. To put in their estimates for the action of Congress the things to execute which they have been asking large loans from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Would it authorize the construction of these various undertakings and leave the matter of the order with the Board of Commissioners?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. They would be appropriated for specifically.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Appropriations would have to be made specifically, but a reading of the report would indicate that authorization of these various enterprises would go with the passing of this bill. I would like to know if that was the view of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MANN. You mean so as not to be subject to a point of order?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is all.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I would like to know whether the gentleman does not think it is giving pretty large authorization in the hands of a single board of commissioners covering all these subjects of improvements?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I certainly do not. Taking into consideration that the General Government pays half, I think they certainly should begin to get something in the way of permanent improvements for the payment of this money.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Would the discretion be left entirely with the board as to which one of these enterprises would be taken up first?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no; Congress would have the say.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It seems to me that Congress would have to appropriate the money, but is not the authorization and discretion left entirely with the board of commissioners?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The last line in the bill provides that Congress shall have the say.

I want to call your attention to who has taken an interest in this proposed legislation. It is quite natural that we should hear criticisms of the board of commissioners, active and earnest as they are in the discharge of their duties, a commission which is made up of three men, namely: Two civilians and an officer from the Army. These men are appointed by the President of the United States, and I have no hesitancy in saying to you that I care not what party the President comes from he will always select commissioners who will reflect honor and credit upon themselves, the District, and the Government.

It was not the two civil commissioners that originated this proposed legislation; they do not claim, neither do they want any credit for it.

Under the practice here legislation for the District can originate in two ways. It is within the province of any Member of Congress to introduce a bill affecting legislation in the District, and such bills, under the practice, are referred by the chairmen of the Senate and House District Committees to the Commissioners of the District for their report on the same. The citizens, if you please, can appear before the commissioners and urge legislation, and if they can convince the commissioners of the wisdom of the same, then the commissioners prepare the bills and send them to the chairmen of the respective House and Senate District Committees, who, under the practice, introduce them in the respective bodies, the Senate and the House; and for years it has been the practice for the chairman of the House District Committee to introduce no other legislation affecting the District of Columbia save that which first receives the indorsement of the commissioners, so that it has become known that when a bill affecting the District of Columbia is introduced by the chairman of the House Committee on the District of Columbia it goes without saying that it has first received the indorsement of the commissioners.

This bill did not originate among the real-estate people of the District, as we have often heard it said. It originated in the brain of the engineer commissioner of the District, a man who is not only eminently fitted as an Army engineer, but who is so fortunate as to possess an added qualification, viz, that of being a good business man—a very happy combination, indeed, to say the least.

At first there were few to be found who favored the proposed legislation, but the more they investigated the matter and listened to the engineer commissioner the more they became satisfied that it was good legislation and was in the interests of the people of the District and the country in general.

It was some time even before the citizens of this District could be convinced that this proposed legislation was wise, but it was only necessary for the engineer commissioner to accept an invitation to speak before the chamber of commerce and the board of trade, when these bodies gave the same their hearty and cordial support, as is shown by the following communication from the Washington Chamber of Commerce:

THE WASHINGTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1911.

The following is a transcript taken from the minutes of the regular monthly meeting of the chamber of commerce, held November 9, 1909.

Under reports of committees the following:

COMMITTEE ON DISTRICT FINANCE.

Mr. George W. White, chairman, introduced Mr. Alonzo Tweedale, of committee, who presented an able and exhaustive report on bonded debt of District of Columbia. It was listened to with pleasure by the organization.

Mr. Tweedale proposed the following:

"Resolved by the Washington Chamber of Commerce, That the plan proposed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia looking to the final extinguishment of the debt of the District of Columbia and proper provision for the future needs of the municipality, both ordinary and extraordinary, is most strongly approved, and that a committee of three members of the chamber be appointed by the president to urge upon Congress the passage of appropriate legislation giving effect to the commissioners' recommendation."

On motion of Mr. Sinclair, the committee's report and resolution were adopted.

And from the Washington Board of Trade:

SPECIAL REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON MUNICIPAL FINANCE, WASHINGTON BOARD OF TRADE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 23, 1910.

To the Washington Board of Trade:

The committee on municipal finance has had under consideration S. 3260 and H. R. 13474—precisely similar bills—to provide for the payment of the debt of the District of Columbia, and to provide for permanent improvements, and for other purposes—referred to it by the board of directors and begs to submit thereon the following report:

These bills were sent to the Senate and House of Representatives by the honorable Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and were drawn to carry out the plan suggested by Maj. Judson, engineer commissioner, to relieve the present financial situation of the District and to accomplish the objects suggested in the title of the bills. This plan has been published in the newspapers, and has been so thoroughly discussed in financial circles, and has been received with such general expressions of approval, that your committee deems it unnecessary to make further extended explanations. A brief statement of the present financial status of the District and of the proposed methods of relief may, however, be appropriate:

The present funded debt of the District, approximating $10,000,000, is being provided for by annual payments to the sinking fund of $975,408, one-half of which—$487,704—is charged against the revenues of the District. The floating debt, some $4,000,000 additional, covering advances by the United States for and on account of the District in constructing permanent improvements, is payable under present requirements of law in five years, or if annual installments are demanded at the rate of $798,503 per annum, with interest at 2 per cent, making $79,850 additional.

With this total annual charge of $1,366,057 against the revenues of the District—which reduces by the same amount the contribution of the United States—there remains, after providing for urgent current needs, as shown in the letter of the commissioners accompanying the bill, "no sufficient provision for the many great public works of importance to the future which should be undertaken and carried forward with reasonable rapidity."

This situation, which has to a great extent been brought upon the District by charging, in many instances, large appropriations wholly to the revenues of the District in clear violation of the organic act, and by requiring advances of the United States, made necessary by reason thereof, to be repaid in too short a period, demands careful consideration of the board of trade.

Under the existing plan of financing the requirements of the District, while the funded debt has decreased under the payments to the sinking fund, the floating debt has increased from approximately $1,900,000, July 1, 1903, to about $4,000,000, notwithstanding large repayments to the United States since that date. If continued, it promises to afford only temporary relief at the expense of increased financial embarrassment. It is evident that the District can not from its present revenues meet its obligations to the United States, provide for current needs, and do much in the way of permanent improvements. Such important public works, necessary to the health, convenience, and comfort of not only the residents of the District, but of all who visit the national capital, as the reclamation of the Anacostia Flats, improvement of Rock Creek Valley, improvement of harbor front, high-pressure fire-protection system, suburban trunk sewers, extension of trunk water mains, building for reformatory and workhouse, acquiring land for park purposes, municipal hospital, and other important works must be indefinitely deferred unless some more satisfactory and effective plan be provided for financing these projects than the one now in practice, which has proven after long trial only adapted, as was doubtless intended, to meet temporary needs.

Shall the debt under any form be increased? The illuminating letter of the commissioners, already referred to, turns a strong light upon the heavy penalty which the District incurs in borrowing money at any ordinary rate of interest. Its annual interest charges are deducted from its revenues, resulting in a corresponding reduction in the contribution of the United States toward the expenses of the District, so that when the full residue of the District revenues is appropriated the practical result is the same as if the District paid double the nominal rate of interest on its debt. For instance, while it pays 3.65 per cent on its funded debt and 2 per cent on its floating debt, yet under the operation of the 50 per cent clause of the organic act the rate of interest is practically $7\frac{1}{3}$ per cent on its funded and 4 per cent on its floating debt. Every dollar of interest paid by the District reduces the combined revenues of the District and the United States available for District needs by $2. Other strong objections to a further increase of the debt are mentioned by the commissioners. They say:

"It appears to be generally true in the lives of cities that the so-called extraordinary improvements in sight at any one epoch are always more numerous and costly than works of the same class that were in sight at any previous epoch, even though all of the latter works may have been executed. The board of commissioners, therefore, is unwilling to advocate a policy of borrowing to accomplish works of this class, as it is apparent that there would be no end of such borrowing. The loans would, in fact, come due at the very time when other so-called extraordinary improvements would demand to be done."

Whatever the views of the board of trade may be as to the expediency of increasing the District debt to provide for permanent improvements, your committee feels assured that no member of the board desires any further debt to be incurred in the way the present floating debt was in great part created by repeated infractions of the organic act.

Sections 12, 16, and 17 provide:

"The said commissioners shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, for his examination and approval, a statement showing in detail the work proposed to be undertaken by them during the fiscal year next ensuing and the estimated cost thereof.

"To the extent to which Congress shall approve of the commissioners' estimates Congress shall appropriate the amount of 50 per cent thereof.

"And the remaining 50 per cent of such approved estimates shall be levied and assessed upon the taxable property and privileges in said District other than the property of the United States and of the District of Columbia."

That act pledges Congress to appropriate 50 per cent, nothing less, of the amount of the approved estimates of the commissioners, and authorizes the remaining 50 per cent, nothing more, to be levied and assessed against District property.

One-half the total amount of the approved estimates was made the measure of the tax levy upon District property after 50 per cent thereof has first been appropriated by Congress. Every appropriation made exclusively from the revenues of the District, except for payment of debt and interest, is in violation of that act and costs the District $2 for every $1 expended.

This act was a tardy recognition by Congress of its long-neglected financial responsibilities and obligations to the District of Columbia. Its observance has brought prosperity; its nonobservance, floating debt, with all its serious consequences. The board of trade should take note of how slowly but surely the nonobservance of this act by Congress has eaten into the revenues of the District to the extent of many millions of dollars, until it threatens, unless checked, the ultimate destruction of the half-and-half feature.

From the first dangerous precedent, established in 1891, 13 years after the passage of the organic act, appropriating wholly from the revenues of the District the insignificant sum of $3,000 for a bathing beach, the amounts so appropriated have increased from year to year until they aggregated at the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, $2,847,283.51. That large sum, with interest thereon, including the interest upon the same amount made thereby unavailable for appropriation for District purposes from the Federal Treasury, approximates the amount of the present floating debt. The importance of the 50 per cent clause of the act, and that it was intended to be a permanent (and final) assumption by the United States of one-half the entire burden of carrying on the government of the District of Columbia, is clearly shown not only in the unmistakable language of the act, but in the protracted debates upon the measure in both Houses of Congress.

Mr. Hendee, in reporting the bill H. R. 3259, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, said:

"There is another clause in the bill which I consider very wise, and perhaps the most important provision in it. It provides that of the expenses or burdens of this District the United States Government shall bear 50 per cent and the people of the District 50 per cent. The United States owns 55 per cent of the entire area of this District. * * * Since the seat of government was established in this District, the entire expenditures of the United States for improvements in the District have been about $9,000,000, while the amount paid by the citizens of the District for the same purpose exceeds the sum of $34,000,000—about four times the amount which has been appropriated by the Federal Government. I make these statements upon data furnished by the Treasury Department and other departments of the Government."

Mr. Blackburn of the committee said:

"I desire to say that the understanding that I have of this feature of the bill—and I am sure that I shall be supported by the committee in the interpretation I give to it—is that the proposition embodied in the bill to divide the expenses between the Federal Government and the District upon the basis of 50 per cent does include all the expenses necessarily incurred in the conduct of the affairs of the District, and does include the very items to which my attention was called by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Buckner. * * *

"There is one point more to which I desire to call the attention of the House and then I have done: It is the necessity of having some basis of expenditure fixed between the Federal Treasury and the District treasury. How can a property holder in the District of Columbia determine or gauge the value of his property to-day? Can he tell what tax it will be subjected to as long as he is left the victim of the whim and caprice of Congress? The property holder does not know whether the appropriation made by Congress will be 10 per cent or 90 per cent of the expenditures of the District. No value can be attached to a foot of real estate owned by a property holder within the limits of this District, because the purchaser can not tell what taxation he will be subjected to. The people of the District have a right to demand that you shall fix this question permanently and finally. If you do not intend to bear more than 10 per cent of the burdens of taxation, say so; if you will bear 50 per cent of it, then say so. But whatever per cent the Federal Government is to bear should be determined and fixed permanently, so that legitimate and permanent values may be established in this District. I beg Congress to establish some permanent form of government."

Mr. Hunton said:

"I have studied this question with a great deal of care, and having been a member of the joint select committee, and also a member of the committee which framed and reported this bill, I say after the maturest reflection I could give to the subject that it is but just to the people that the Government should bear equally with the people the burdens of the government of the District of Columbia."

Two amendments were offered in the House—one reducing the share of the expenditures to be assumed by the United States to 25 per cent and the other to 40 per cent thereof. Both amendments were overwhelmingly defeated.

In the Senate no amendment was offered upon this feature of the bill.

Senator Bayard offered an amendment, which was accepted by the Senate, reducing the rate per hundred from $2 to $1.50. Upon that amendment he said:

"The bill contains excellent provision as to estimates for the expenditures of the District, so that Congress shall have control of the cost of governing the District, of carrying on public works here, and then the laying of the tax shall follow that. I have before now expressed the belief, and I now reiterate it, that I do not believe the property of this District in the hands of private citizens can bear one-half the cost of keeping up improvements such as we see around us on the scale which they have assumed. The effect of overtaxation is obvious. It stops all improvements; it deters immigration; it lowers the value of property; discourages persons coming here and attempting to improve the city."

These debates show in the strongest and clearest language that it was the intention of the framers of the organic act, and the intention of the Congress which enacted it into law, that it was to permanently and finally fix the share of expenditures in this District to be assumed by the United States at 50 per cent, and that the amount was not to be left—in the language of Mr. Blackburn—to the whim or caprice of Congress. They show also that Congress intended to protect property here from excessive taxation by reserving to itself the exclusive right to fix the amount of taxes to be raised each year, rather than leave it to the caprice or whim of anyone charged with the duty of valuing property for taxation. The assessor may not fix the value for taxation at less than two-thirds its actual market value nor the rate at more than $1.50 per hundred. But whatever the rate may be, or whatever the value may be, whether they go up or down, these two factors, if the organic act is to be followed, must be so adjusted as to produce 50 per cent, or more, of the amount of the approved estimates. That law contemplated no surplus revenues in this District to induce or tempt extravagant expenditures on the one hand nor did it on the other hand contemplate floating debt with its evil consequences.

If this act may be ignored for one purpose, it may be ignored for all purposes. Let there be no infractions of the half-and-half plan should be the slogan of the board of trade, in the opinion of your committee.

Fortunately for all concerned, the plan under consideration, while avoiding any additions to the present debt, provides in a simple and effective way for current needs, all necessary permanent works, and for the gradual and easy extinction of both the funded and floating debts within 30 years. By extending the time for the payment of the floating debt until 1925, when the funded debt will have been extinguished under the operation of the sinking fund, there will be released until that time the amount that otherwise would be annually paid on the floating debt, plus an equal amount contributed by the United States, so that had this plan been authorized by the last Congress there would have been available for permanent improvements in 1911 approximately $1,030,000, after providing sufficiently for all current needs. Under this plan the normal annual increase of $500,000 in the District revenues, including the 50 per cent to be paid by the United States, will be applied as follows: Four hundred thousand dollars to current needs and $100,000 to permanent improvements, thus largely increasing the annual expenditures for these purposes.

"If," say the commissioners, "the arrangement be adopted during the 12 years beginning with 1912, the amounts available for extraordinary improvements will aggregate $20,160,000. It is believed that in 12 years not more than this sum can be expended on the objects proposed (those hereinafter mentioned) with economy and in accordance with plans deliberately matured."

CONCLUSIONS.

The great advantages of the plan proposed in S. 3260 and H. R. 13474 are:

First. Its simplicity.

Second. That it avoids further advance by the United States or further increase of the District debt.

Third. That it provides a certain and easy way for gradually extinguishing the entire debt within 30 years.

Fourth. That it provides amply for all needs, current and extraordinary, and for an annual increase of half a million dollars in the appropriations for all purposes.

Fifth. That with the knowledge for several years in advance of approximately the amount that will be available each year, the commissioners and the committees of Congress can work out more economical and better digested plans for all important works.

Finally, it will, if adopted, make a most satisfactory settlement of a most unsatisfactory and disturbing financial situation, and place the financial affairs of the District upon a safe, certain, and permanent basis.

Your committee, therefore, strongly recommends that the board of trade give these bills its unqualified approval and earnest support.

Respectfully submitted.

GEORGE TRUESDELL, Chairman.

And individual citizens became deeply interested as they acquainted themselves with the proposition, as is shown by the following letter from Mr. Hopewell H. Darneille, for several years one of the best and most popular assessors of the District:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 18, 1910.

Hon. SAMUEL W. SMITH,
Chairman District of Columbia Committee,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: In accordance with my promise, I send you herewith my views of House bill No. 13474, known as the Judson financial bill.

After consulting some of my most intimate friends, who are very familiar with the District's finances, and making a thorough and lengthy study of this bill, I am of the opinion that it is a fine solution of the financial affairs of the District of Columbia.

The condition that confronts the District at the present is that there are permanent improvements which seem to demand immediate attention, viz, reclamation of the Anacostia Flats, Rock Creek Valley improvements, harbor front, high-pressure service, parking system suburban trunk sewers and water mains, municipal hospital, grade crossings, and workhouse, estimated at about $18,733,795, after eliminating section 1 of the estimates for Anacostia Flats, which is for a navigable river and will no doubt be provided for by the General Government appropriations, which is usual for such rivers.

The bonded debt of the District is approximately $10,000,000, at 3.65 per cent interest, and the floating debt about $4,000,000, at 2 per cent interest.

By operation of the sinking fund the bonded debt will be extinguished in about 12 years, thus leaving the $487,704, which is now paid yearly from District revenue for interest and sinking fund, it being one-half of the appropriation, to be applied to the liquidation of the floating debt, and in addition to this sum the $80,000 annual interest on the $4,000,000 floating debt, and we have $567,704 annually from District revenues to take care of the floating debt after the bonded debt is extinguished. In other words, at the end of the term of, say, 12 years, or at the most 14 years, the District will have paid the bonded debt and the interest on the floating debt up to that time, leaving its indebtedness to the United States in the sum of $4,000,000 at 2 per cent interest per annum. This sum, together with the interest, could be paid by applying the $567,704 annually to its liquidation in a little over seven years.

On this basis of present revenues available and its reasonable annual increase, it would leave after providing for other municipal needs about $1,100,000 annually to be applied to these permanent improvements out of combined revenues, without any increase in indebtedness. This would leave the District in first-class financial condition.

Congress should have entire control of the expenditures, and I would suggest that a proviso be added to the bill that hereafter no indebtedness be incurred or money expended under the provisions of this act without the specific authorization of Congress, and then you could so regulate appropriations and avoid making any serious indebtedness in the future.

To pay back the $4,000,000 in five years, as is now provided, would so cripple the revenues that any considerable amount of permanent improvements is out of the question and will be for some years to come.

I feel very confident that 20 years, or 22 years at most, would be the limit for the entire extinguishment of all indebtedness now owed by the District if the scheme proposed in this bill is carried out.

I send herewith figures demonstrating how the $4,000,000 could be paid in eight years after the bonded debt has been paid.

Yours, very sincerely, H. H. DARNEILLE.

And last, but not least, I insert a quotation from the annual message of President Taft of December 6, 1910, viz:

PERMANENT IMPROVEMENTS.

Among the items for permanent improvements appearing in the District estimates for 1912 is one designed to substitute for Willow Tree Alley, notorious in the records of the police and health departments, a playground with a building containing baths, a gymnasium, and other helpful features, and I hope Congress will approve this estimate. Fair as Washington seems with her beautiful streets and shade trees, and free, as the expanse of territory which she occupies would seem to make her, from slums and insanitary congestion of population, there are centers in the interior of squares where the very poor, and the criminal classes as well, huddle together in filth and noisome surroundings, and it is of primary importance that these nuclei of disease and suffering and vice should be removed, and that there should be substituted for them small parks as breathing spaces, and model tenements having sufficient air space and meeting other hygienic requirements. The estimate for the reform of Willow Tree Alley, the worst of these places in the city, is the beginning of a movement that ought to attract the earnest attention and support of Congress, for Congress can not escape its responsibility for the existence of these human pestholes.

The estimates for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1912 provide for the repayment to the United States of $616,000, one-fourth of the floating debt that will remain on June 30, 1911. The bonded debt will be reduced in 1912 by about the same amount.

The District of Columbia is now in an excellent financial condition. Its own share of indebtedness will, it is estimated, be less than $6,000,000 on June 30, 1912, as compared with about $9,000,000 on June 30, 1909.

The bonded debt, owed half and half by the United States and the District, will be extinguished by 1924, and the floating debt of the District probably long before that time.

The revenues have doubled in the last 10 years, while the population during the same period has increased but 18.78 per cent. It is believed that, if due economy be practiced, the District can soon emerge from debt, even while financing its permanent improvements with reasonable rapidity from current revenues.

To this end, I recommend the enactment into law of a bill now before Congress—and known as the Judson bill—which will insure the gradual extinguishment of the District's debt, while at the same time requiring that the many permanent improvements needed to complete a fitting Capital City shall be carried on from year to year and at a proper rate of progress with funds derived from the rapidly increasing revenues.

And I want to say that no President since the days of Washington has taken a deeper interest in the affairs of the District of Columbia than has our beloved President, William Howard Taft.

I do not feel that these remarks would be complete without inserting as a part of the same a letter from the former commissioners, addressed to Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON, Speaker of the House of Representatives, dated October 25, 1909:

COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, October 25, 1909.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: In preparing its annual estimates for the fiscal year 1911, the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia has found no difficulty in providing within the estimated means available for all current needs in accordance with reasonable standards of efficiency.

In addition to current needs, provision has been made for the payment of $975,408 on account of interest and sinking fund pertaining to the bonded indebtedness, and provision has further been made for repayment to the United States of $480,000, principal and interest, on account of advances made by the United States to the District proper.

The debt of the District of Columbia, considering the latter as made up of two partners, the District proper and the United States, includes a bonded debt of approximately $10,000,000. The District proper owes the other partner, the United States, approximately $4,000,000. Inasmuch as repayments on account of this $4,000,000, principal and interest, will be deducted from the District's future contributions to the partnership fund, perforce the contributions of the other partner, the United States, will be diminished accordingly. That is to say, in the future as the District proper repays to the United States this $4,000,000, with interest, the total means available of the partnership will be reduced by an amount equivalent to $8,000,000, with interest at 2 per cent. The financial condition of the District, then, considered as a partnership, is precisely as if it owed a bonded debt of nearly $10,000,000, bearing 3.65 per cent interest, and a floating debt of approximately $8,000,000, bearing 2 per cent interest.

It appears to be the intention of Congress that the floating debt shall be paid off within five years. The bonded debt must be paid within 15 years, if the bonds are to be met at maturity. Thus the District, considered as a partnership, appears obligated to pay off its debt of virtually $18,000,000 wholly within 15 years and in very large part within five years.

Due to payments on account of debt, the combined resources of the partnership available for general purposes are, in effect, reduced, in the estimate submitted for the fiscal year 1911, by $975,408, plus $960,000, or a total of $1,935,408.

While, as above stated, current needs have been amply provided for in the 1911 estimates, yet it must be admitted that no sufficient provision has been made for the many great public works of importance to the future, which should soon be undertaken and carried forward with reasonable rapidity. In the past this provision has been made by generous advances from the Federal Treasury. It is apparent, however, that if this arrangement is continued in order that these great projects which already demand initiation shall be undertaken, not to mention the enterprises which experience shows will undoubtedly present themselves in the future, the amount of debt now incurred will be greatly increased and its burden will eventually rest heavily upon the District. If, therefore, any plan can be presented whereby these advances shall cease and yet these large permanent improvements can be carried forward without sacrificing the efficiency in current municipal work, the commissioners believe that such a plan would commend itself to Congress and to the community, whose affairs are, in part, intrusted to their administration. The solution of the problem, in their judgment, lies in extending the period of time in which the debt of the District shall be paid.

If of the contribution of the District proper there be each year applied to payment of debt, principal, and interest $567,704, it is certain that the process will, in some such period as 25 years, extinguish principal and interest of the half of the bonded and floating debt of the District proper, such half amounting to approximately $9,000,000. Each year the financial condition of the District will be improved, for each year its debt will be less, until within 25 years it will be extinguished, provided nothing more be borrowed in the meantime. This arrangement would be equivalent to an extension of time granted by the United States to its partner, the District proper, for the repayment of the $4,000,000 which the latter owes the former. The annual provision of $567,704 from District revenues includes $487,704, which is the District's half of annual payments, sufficient to extinguish the bonded debt, and the further sum of $80,000, the interest due annually on the $4,000,000 advanced by the United States to the District proper. After the extinction of the bonded debt in 1924, the $567,704 would be applied annually toward the extinction of the debt owed by the District proper to the United States.

If this arrangement had been authorized by Congress when the estimates for the fiscal year 1911 were being prepared, there would have been available for extraordinary improvements approximately $1,030,000.

The revenues of the District proper increase at the rate of practically $250,000 per annum. Thus the revenues of the partnership may be said to increase at the rate of $500,000 per annum. This rate of increase, past and prospective, makes the proposed plan practicable. The board of commissioners is confident that four-fifths of this increment will be an ample annual increase in the aggregate of all those items of the estimates devoted to current needs.

It is proposed, therefore, as a quid pro quo, if Congress shall extend the time during which the debt shall be paid to some such period as 25 years, that it shall be made obligatory upon the commissioners, in submitting their estimates, to provide annually for such reduction of the debt as will make it each year less and finally extinguish it, principal and interest, in about 25 years; to borrow no more money from the United States Treasury or elsewhere, and to provide annually for extraordinary improvements on the scale on which they might have been undertaken in 1911 (without sacrifice of current needs) if the payment of the debt had already been made more gradual, as proposed above, adding each year to the fund for extraordinary improvements a sum estimated to be one-fifth of the increase in combined revenues. Thus for any fiscal year there would be added for extraordinary improvements to $1,030,000 one-fifth the increment of means available, counting from 1911, so that, for example, if in 1911 $1,030,000 were available, that amount would be increased by $100,000 the subsequent year; $100,000 more would be added the next year, and so on.

To the end that this policy may be inaugurated and the continuance of the policy safeguarded, the board of commissioners presents herewith a draft of a bill designed to place such a system in operation and to insure its continuance. A term of 12 years has been provided in the bill as the period during which this arrangement shall continue.

If the arrangement be adopted, during the 12 years beginning with 1912 the amounts available for extraordinary improvements will aggregate $20,160,000. It is believed that in 12 years not more than this sum can be expended on the objects proposed with economy and in accordance with plans deliberately matured.

By the end of the 12 years doubtless other great projects will demand recognition, but by that time, under the same system, much larger sums will be annually available.

To recapitulate, the plan advocated will not only reduce the debt every year and finally extinguish it, but, always caring for current needs, will insure the expenditure of some $20,000,000 in extraordinary improvements during the 12 years ending with 1923, and leave, at the end of that period, an even greater power in the District to accomplish the extraordinary projects which will then be in sight.

There is inclosed herewith, in addition to the draft of the proposed bill, a memorandum of the proposed items of extraordinary improvements, together with tentative estimates of cost.

Very respectfully,

HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
HENRY L. WEST,
W. V. JUDSON,
Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

And the full and comprehensive argument of the Engineer Commissioner—Maj. W. V. Judson:

Payment of District debt and permanent improvements.

COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Thursday, March 3, 1910.

The subcommittee met at 11.10 o'clock a. m., Chairman Smith presiding.

ARGUMENT OF MAJ. W. V. JUDSON, ENGINEER COMMISSIONER, REPRESENTING THE BOARD OF DISTRICT COMMISSIONERS.

The city of Washington, because it is the seat of government and the capital city of the United States, possesses among all American cities a peculiar function, which is to attract and hold the sentimental regard of all the Nation and add to its patriotic feeling. Its physical characteristics must be such as are consistent with this function.

In a sense, the capital city of a nation is symbolic of its stability and aspirations.

In performing its function it acts in a certain degree as do the national colors, centering about itself the affection of the people and inspiring them to a healthy national feeling.

In time of war a national capital is often made the objective of hostile operations by reason of the moral effect that would result from its capture, injury, or destruction, and a government would rely largely upon the love of a people for its capital to stir the nation to a successful resistance.

The public interest of all the people of the United States in Washington is evidenced not only by the constitutional provision for its government and by the considerations I have mentioned, but also by the policy of Congress, as evidenced by annual contributions to the District of Columbia of between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000. In fairness the people must find in Washington some quid pro quo. When they visit Washington or talk or read about it, they expect, as a result of their contributions, to contemplate a city worthy of the natural pride that has induced such contributions. It would seem, even, that they may properly demand this.

In Washington, then, to satisfy physical requirements, so far as they depend upon public funds, a part of the expenditures must be directed toward, we may say, monumental things. To satisfy bare current necessities by current public expenditure will not produce a city such as the people have a right to demand. And yet in our last few appropriation acts nothing has been done except to care for current needs. In the last year or two, certainly, the people of the Nation, not resident in Washington, have received but little for their very large contributions to the funds appropriated.

The revenues of the District of Columbia have been increasing rapidly, at the rate of about $250,000 per annum; thus the combined revenues have been and are increasing at the rate of about $500,000 per annum. Current needs, being a function of area and of population, are increasing at a much less rapid rate than are the means available. The debt is being rapidly paid off. The only thing that is not being done at the present time is to effect those permanent or extraordinary improvements such as are essential in the case of Washington. These improvements can be made more economically if made systematically. The ample revenues eliminate any need for the borrowing of money. It is only necessary to make a program of expenditure so that each item of work shall not be "new legislation," requiring, for consideration and appropriation, the action of four or more committees of Congress and the passage of a separate act.

The bill is designed to carry out this idea of establishing a program. As the result of the passage of this bill, $20,160,000 would become available for expenditure on permanent or extraordinary improvements within the next 12 years. The gradual elimination of the debt is provided for so that within 25 years no indebtedness would remain.

There is nothing in this bill that would divert from the funds annually available more than can be spared for the purposes under consideration. An ample amount will remain each year for all current needs. This bill has been forwarded to Congress by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia with their most favorable consideration. It is very important that it should become a law at this session of Congress in order that the halt in the making of permanent improvements may end before the advance in real estate values shall materially increase the cost of obtaining the land that will be required for parks, etc.

In preparing its annual estimates for the fiscal year 1911 the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia found no difficulty in providing within the estimated means available for all current needs in accordance with reasonable standards of efficiency.

In addition to current needs, provision was made for the payment of $975,408 on account of interest and sinking fund pertaining to the bonded indebtedness, and provision has further been made for payment to the United States of $480,000, principal and interest on account of advances made by the United States to the District proper.

The debt of the District of Columbia, considering the latter as made up of two partners, the District proper and the United States, includes a bonded debt of approximately $10,000,000. The District proper owes the other partner, the United States, approximately $4,000,000. Inasmuch as payments on account of this $4,000,000, principal and interest will be deducted from the District's future contributions to the partnership fund, perforce the contributions of the other partner, the United States, will be diminished accordingly. That is to say, in the future, as the District proper repays to the United States this $4,000,000, with interest, the total means available of the partnership will be reduced by an amount equivalent to $8,000,000, with interest at 2 per cent. The financial condition of the District, then, considered as a partnership, is precisely as if it owed a bonded debt of nearly $10,000,000, bearing 3.65 per cent interest, and a floating debt of approximately $8,000,000, bearing 2 per cent interest.

It appears to be the intention of Congress that the floating debt shall be paid off within 5 years. The bonded debt must be paid off within 15 years, if the bonds are to be met at maturity. Thus the District, considered as a partnership, appears obligated to pay off its debt of $18,000,000 wholly within 15 years, and in very large part within 5 years.

In the last 30 years the debt has been reduced from $23,000,000 to virtually $18,000,000. What is provided in the bill is, therefore, a great improvement on what has been done in the past, as regards the debt, for the bill contemplates the complete extinction of the debt in 25 years or less.

Due to payments on account of debt, the combined resources of the partnership available for general purposes are, in effect, reduced in the estimates submitted for the fiscal year 1911 by $975,408 plus $960,000, or a total of $1,935,408.

The District appropriation bill as it comes from conference shows a reduction of $555,205.50 from the estimates of the commissioners. The effect is to cause the District to repay to the United States on account of advances a further sum of one-half that amount, or $277,602.75. The total reduction due to payments on account of debt during 1911 may therefore be set at $2,490,613.50.

While, as above stated, current needs have been amply provided for in the 1911 estimates, and Congress has been able to provide for said current needs with an appropriation $555,205.50 less than the estimates, yet it must be admitted that no sufficient provision has been made for the many great public works of importance to the future which should be undertaken and carried forward with reasonable rapidity.

The Board of Commissioners hestitates to employ the phrase "extraordinary improvements" as applied to works of this class, for the reason that it appears to be generally true in the lives of cities that the so-called extraordinary improvements in sight at any one epoch are always more numerous and costly than works of the same class that were in sight at any previous epoch, even though all of the latter works may have been executed. The Board of Commissioners, therefore, is unwilling to advocate a policy of borrowing to accomplish works of this class, as it is apparent that there would be no end to such borrowing. The loans would, in fact, come due at the very time when other so-called extraordinary improvements would demand to be done.

In emergencies doubtless the creation of municipal debts is justifiable. Certainly the borrowing of money by anybody is a sound business proposition when a larger interest can be earned upon the money borrowed than is paid for its use. But it is, nevertheless, true that no one should go in debt whose means are ample, with due economy but with reasonable dispatch, to make all of the outlays which he considers desirable. And such is the position of the District of Columbia at this time.

It appears to be in accordance with sound business policy now to arrange our finances and our public works in such a manner as will permit of an annual reduction of our debt and at the same time insure the carrying forward of the permanent improvements that, for lack of a better word, may be termed "extraordinary," since it is apparent that these things can be done without sacrifice of efficiency in the ordinary current work.

The Board of Commissioners is convinced that but one thing is needed to make this practicable, and that is an extension of the period of time during which the debt of the District shall be paid. Even this extension is more apparent than real, as only the estimates of the commissioners are to be based upon such extension, while by one-half of whatever amount Congress shall in appropriating see fit to reduce such estimates—and, judging by the past, it seems probable that Congress will reduce them—the debt due the United States by the District will, in fact, be diminished. Moreover, whatever appropriations be made, there are always some balances unexpended at the end of each fiscal year, and one-half of all such balances are applied to a reduction of the debt due the United States by the District.

If of the District proper contribution there be each year applied to the payment of debt, principal and interest, $567,704, it is certain that the process will, in some such period as 25 years, extinguish principal and interest of the District proper half of the bonded and floating debt, such half amounting to approximately $9,000,000. Each year the financial condition of the District will be improved; for each year its debt will be less, until within 25 years it will be extinguished, provided nothing more be borrowed in the meantime. This arrangement would be equivalent to an extension of time granted by the United States to its partner, the District proper, for the repayment of the $4,000,000, which the latter owes the former. But, as is above pointed out, this debt would in all probability be paid in a considerably shorter space of time, due to the anticipated action of Congress in reducing the commissioners' estimates.

The annual provision of $567,704 from the District revenues includes $487,704, which is the District's half of an annual payment sufficient to extinguish the bonded debt, and the further sum of $80,000, the interest due annually on the $4,000,000 advanced by the United States to the District proper. After the extinction of the bonded debt in 1924, the $567,704 would be applied annually toward the extinction of the debt owed by the District proper to the United States, if any such debt should then remain.

If this arrangement had been authorized by Congress when the estimates for the fiscal year 1911 were being prepared, there would have been available for extraordinary improvements approximately $1,030,000. Or assuming that the provisions of the District appropriation bill, as agreed upon in conference, are ample for current needs, then $1,585,205.50 would have been so available.

As has been before stated, the revenues of the District proper increase at the rate of practically $250,000 per annum. Thus the revenues of the partnership may be said to increase at the rate of $500,000 per annum. The Board of Commissioners is confident that four-fifths of this increment will be an ample annual increase in the aggregate of all those items of the estimates devoted to current needs.

It is proposed therefore as a quid pro quo, if Congress shall extend the time for paying the debt, as provided in the bill and as explained above, that it shall be made obligatory upon the commissioners, in submitting their estimates, to provide annually for such reduction of the debt as will make it each year less and, finally, extinguish it, principal and interest, in less than 25 years; to seek to borrow no more money from the United States Treasury or elsewhere, and to provide annually for extraordinary improvements on the scale on which they might have been undertaken in 1911 (without neglect of current needs) if the payment of the debt had already been made more gradual, as proposed above, adding each year to the fund for extraordinary improvements a sum estimated to be one-fifth of the increase in combined revenues. Thus, for any fiscal year there would be added for extraordinary improvements to $1,030,000 one-fifth of the increment of means available, counting from 1911; so that, for example, if in 1911 $1,030,000 were available, that amount would be increased by $100,000 the subsequent year, $100,000 more would be added the next year, and so on.

To the end that this policy may be inaugurated and the continuance of the policy safeguarded, the Board of Commissioners presents herewith a draft of a bill designed to place such a system in operation and to insure its continuance. A term of 12 years has been provided in the bill as the period during which this arrangement shall continue.

If the arrangement be adopted, during the 12 years beginning with 1912 the amounts available for extraordinary improvements will aggregate $20,160,000. It is believed that in 12 years not more than this sum can be expended on the objects proposed with economy and in accordance with plans deliberately matured.

At the end of the 12 years doubtless other great projects will demand recognition, but by this time, under the same system, much larger sums will be annually available.

To recapitulate, the plan advocated will not only reduce the debt every year and finally extinguish it, but, always caring for current needs, will insure the expenditure of some $20,000,000 in extraordinary improvements during the 12 years ending with 1923, and leave at the end of that period an even greater power in the District to accomplish the extraordinary projects that will be then in sight.

SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT BY MAJ. JUDSON, FEBRUARY 28, 1911.

The argument for this bill was prepared about a year ago. Since that time there has been a considerable reduction of both bonded and floating debts.

By June 30, 1911, it is estimated that the bonded debt will be reduced to $8,800,000, and the floating debt to $2,400,000; and by June 30, 1912, it is estimated that the bonded debt will be reduced to $8,200,000, and the floating debt to $1,800,000.

The bill now before the House controls the allotment of District funds in the estimates of the commissioners from and after June 30, 1912, when the debt condition will be as last stated.

If this bill shall become a law the bonded debt will necessarily be extinguished by 1924, and the floating debt by 1928. Certain practical causes will operate to extinguish the debt at a much earlier period. In the first place it is inconceivable that Congress will appropriate in the future any more than it has in the past every dollar recommended by the commissioners in their estimates. And by every dollar that Congress, in appropriating, reduces the annual estimates of the commissioners the floating debt of the District will be reduced 50 cents. Again, the commissioners, in beginning to prepare their annual estimates, are obliged to start out with a conservative estimate of the amount that will be received from taxes and other sources. By just the amount that the actual receipts exceed this conservative estimate of them the floating debt will be automatically reduced. Experience shows that the commissioners do make this estimate conservatively, and that the actual revenues do exceed their estimates of them. And finally there are always unexpended balances of appropriations that revert to the Treasury every year. These balances operate automatically to reduce the floating debt.

The closest students of the District's finances believe that the floating debt will in fact be extinguished before 1924, when the bonds will have been retired. At any rate, it is certain that if this bill passes, the District will emerge from debt at some time between 1924 and 1928—and in all probability by 1924.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMS. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, as has been properly said by the chairman of the District Committee, this is one of the most important bills that has come before this body for its consideration. And in connection with it there has been more parliamentary legerdemain than I ever saw connected with any bill that has ever come upon this floor.

About a year ago a bill was introduced under the number which this one now bears. It was considered by the committee, and thereby a bill under this number was brought before the committee. There it was considered by the committee; and, if I recollect correctly, it passed the committee by a scant majority.

But the other day, Mr. Speaker, I ask this House to remember, when this bill by number came up for consideration, the chairman of the committee asked that a Senate bill, which, if I am correctly informed, has not yet passed the Senate, be substituted for it.

Mr. SIMS. It has not been reported by any committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes. And yet in less than a minute he changed his position and asked that another bill still might be introduced in lieu of the bill that was introduced here a year ago.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am sure that the gentleman does not intend to make a misstatement. I have never made the claim for a single moment that the Senate bill had passed.

Mr. SIMS. He did not even show the number of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Speaker, when this bill was called up by number for consideration, it was moved, I repeat, to substitute a Senate bill, which had never been reported, as I understand, to the Senate, and therefore had never been adopted by the Senate. Then, in a few seconds thereafter, the chairman of the committee asked leave to withdraw that and to substitute another bill in lieu of the Senate bill. That other bill which he asked leave to introduce in lieu of it had not then been prepared. Not only had it not been introduced before this House, not only that, but it had never gone to a committee of either this House or the Senate; and, I repeat, it had not then been prepared. But on night before last it was prepared and was printed in the RECORD of yesterday, and here it comes to-day, offered to this House, changed even again, so that it is not the bill which you gentlemen read in the RECORD of yesterday morning.

And, more than that, I say that the bill which you are asked to vote for now has never been considered by a committee, either of this House or of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman is mistaken. The bill which is reported here is identical with the one printed in the RECORD, with the exception of one line, and that was stricken out to please Members here, and certainly they ought not to object to that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. When did the committee meet to approve this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman knows why we have not met. It has simply been because we have not had opportunity to do business.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Here is a bill called up before this House which the committee has not been called together to consider, and even the bill which appeared yesterday morning in the RECORD for your consideration is changed now, and the Members of this House are asked to vote for a bill which they have not seen, unless they have gotten it from that desk a few moments ago.

The members of the committee have not been advised as to the changes made in the bill except as by diligence, perchance, they themselves have found them.

Now, what does this bill do—this bill that is sprung before this House without notice and without warning? It appropriates more millions of dollars than any man here supposes. I say there is no limit to the amount of money which this bill carries. And when you have adopted it you have taken from the District Committee, you have taken from this House, the right to make appropriations for permanent improvements herein contained until the year 1925.

The bill provides that in determining the estimates of funds available for appropriation in each succeeding fiscal year the commissioners shall first provide and set aside from the estimated District revenues a sufficient sum to meet all the estimated and fixed charges required by law to be paid wholly from the revenues of the District. How much is that? Who knows? Where is the man who can tell us how much that amounts to? And then you go along further down to the bottom of the page and observe that it appropriates the sum of $300,000 as "a repayment on account of said advances" until the indebtedness of the District of Columbia to the United States has been paid. How many years, I pray of you, will it take at $300,000 a year to pay the indebtedness to the United States?

Mr. BORLAND. Twelve years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is not stated here, and no man can tell if those commissioners are left to approximate the amounts as they may see fit.

In addition to that the District of Columbia is now indebted to the United States Government to the amount of something like $13,500,000. They say this bill is introduced in order that the District of Columbia may pay that indebtedness, but how is it to be paid?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this District was indebted to the Government to the amount of $13,500,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I said about that sum, and I can prove it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I should like to hear the proof.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Here is a letter, signed by a man whose name I can not read, but he is auditor of the District of Columbia, in which he says:

On page 13 you will find a recapitulation of the total debt of the District. The bonded indebtedness, represented by 3.65 bonds outstanding June 30, 1910, is $9,492,100. The floating indebtedness at the same time amounted to $3,374,278.98, making a total of $12,766,378.96.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Does the gentleman from Kentucky know, or does he not know, that the Government of the United States pays one-half of the bonded indebtedness?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I say——

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Will the gentleman answer?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That depends on whether or not this bill passes.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. On the bonds outstanding which the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Here are $9,500,000 in a bonded debt owing by the District of Columbia to the United States. And this measure proposes not that the District of Columbia shall pay that debt to the United States, but that it shall be paid out of the joint funds owned by the District of Columbia and the United States, thereby compelling the United States Government to pay one-half of the bonds held against the District of Columbia, which bonds are made payable to the United States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How much time has the gentleman used?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the District of Columbia Committee I wish to substantiate what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has said concerning this measure.

The bill has been changed four times within 48 hours. It has never been reported from our committee; it has never been submitted to the members of the committee, separately or individually, and yet, at this late hour, this House is asked to suspend the rules for the purpose of divesting Congress of the power and giving to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia certain functions, for which the sum of at least $20,000,000 is to be expended in the next 12 years, and the amount of money may run to thirty or forty millions of dollars.

Now this is the proposition before the House. As a result of the study of the organic act of 1878 creating the District government, I maintain that it was never contemplated to divest Congress of its power over the appropriations for great contemplated public works in the District. That act shows that those urging them must come to Congress every year for their public works. The chairman of the District of Columbia Committee [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] gave the whole secret away when he said it emanated from the brain of the District Engineer Commissioner. It did emanate from his fertile brain, for the purpose of seizing power which now belongs to Congress, and which should not be placed beyond the power of Congress.

As a member of the District of Columbia Committee I have favored large appropriations for public improvements, but I do not desire in the closing hours of my service in this House to give my sanction to any such bill as this. It has a very pleasing fringe about it in the beginning of the bill, where it speaks about wiping out debt, but the purpose of this bill, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] himself has said, is to increase the power of the District engineer officer and to make the District Commissioners and not Congress the arbiters of permanent improvements in the District.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the House should never enact legislation of so extraordinary a character unless there is some general demand for it, and as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I must say that I have failed to see any demand for it except from some real estate speculators and the District engineer commissioner. Among the public improvements contemplated by this bill, may I ask why there is only one mentioned by name, and that is the reclamation of the Anacostia flats? Who are behind that, that they have power enough to spring their pet project in a bill like this? Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to the report of the committee on the Union Calendar, No. 276, made by the gentleman from Michigan when this bill was first introduced in the House some year and a half ago.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In June, 1910.

Mr. FISH. They have stricken out of this bill improvements estimated to cost some $6,000,000.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FISH. I ask for one minute more.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. FISH. I want to call attention of the House that while this bill estimates for improvements to cost the same amount as the bill originally introduced by the gentleman from Michigan—that is, covering at least $20,000,000—they have left out of this bill the improvement of Rock Creek Valley, at an estimated cost of $4,750,000, and the improvement of harbor front, at an estimated cost of $1,200,000, the two items aggregating almost $6,000,000. In all there should be only $14,000,000 instead of $20,000,000 appropriated in this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the revenues of the District of Columbia are increasing every day. Every dollar of the revenue thus far raised has been used for the ordinary running expenses of the government. All permanent improvements thus far made have been made from funds borrowed from the Federal Treasury. There are $2,800,000 of this money borrowed to be paid. This bill provides for the payment of this $2,800,000 out of the revenues of the District at the rate of $300,000 every year. This bill provides for the setting aside of $1,230,000 a year until 1924, for the purpose of making permanent improvements, and these permanent improvements consist of the reclamation of the Anacostia Flats and the turning of these flats into a park. They consist of a permanent system of sewerage, the extension of the water mains, furnishing facilities to the people who are here to-day and those who are yet to come.

The bill provides that after these two sums—$1,230,000 and $300,000, making $1,530,000—every year shall have been taken from the revenues of the District, that what remains after the deduction of these sums shall be appropriated for the ordinary conduct of the District of Columbia, and to this sum, which is set aside after making these enormous deductions, shall be added an equal sum out of the Treasury of the Federal Government.

This bill should be entitled "For economy of government." It is the best bill ever reported by any committee in charge of District affairs. It contains a permanent system of improvements. It contains a policy of paying the debt of the people of the District of Columbia. It contains the policy of the extension of parks for the people of the District. It contains a permanent policy for the beautification of the District of Columbia, a thing in which every citizen of the Union is interested. It economizes in the conduct of the government. It takes $1,550,000 every year less out of the Federal Treasury than is taken from it now. It compels the people of the District to pay for their permanent improvements out of the revenues which they raise from taxation every year, and there is nothing behind the bill to frighten anybody. It is a bill prepared after the most deliberate consideration. It is a bill in the interest of the future of the District of Columbia. It is a bill which prompts men to do what is best for the people of this District in the days that are to come, and there is no man on the floor of this House, no matter which side of the aisle he may sit upon, who ought not to be in favor of its enactment into law.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] did not state the facts. He talked about the bonded debt, and this bill has nothing to do with the bonded debt. This bill deals with the floating debt, and it compels them to pay a fixed sum every year, and at the same time appropriates for the development of the District so that every citizen in America will be proud of Washington when he comes to visit it. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDRUS].

Mr. ANDRUS. Mr. Speaker, it is not an easy thing for me to disagree with the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee. I respect him highly; I consider him an honest, forceful, efficient Member, and whatever I accord to myself I am willing to give to every other person. If I want to investigate a matter, and my judgment dictates a certain line of policy, it is my duty to follow it, because I want to live in peace with my conscience.

I object to certain features in this bill, and I see no good reason why we should pay the funded debt just now, or why we should pay for these great improvements upward of $20,000,000 as the work is done.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDRUS. I can not; I have only five minutes. I believe good business sense should prevail in my district as in yours. Perhaps our people are paying 4 to 4½ and 5 per cent and perhaps 6 per cent on money used for purposes in our cities, villages, or county. Is it not good business to pay the obligations drawing the highest rate of interest rather than to pay the obligations drawing the lowest rate of interest?

I see no reason why we should not continue to issue a few bonds. What is the bonded debt of the District to-day? Thirteen million five hundred thousand dollars. To the credit of the District be it said they are reducing their indebtedness rather than increasing it, but during the last 30 years what has been the result? They have reduced their bonded indebtedness from twenty-three million to thirteen million five hundred thousand.

I secured these figures in the report accompanying the original bill, and the District has reduced its bonded indebtedness during the last 30 years at the rate of $166,666 a year. It is creditable to the District.

Now, what is it we propose to do? We propose to spend twenty millions and reduce the indebtedness of $13,500,000 in 12 years. We have been reducing it at the rate of one hundred and sixty-six thousand plus, and now we are proposing to reduce it three millions—plus 19 times as much—and pay off this sum each year. I think this proposition should be voted down.

But there is a more serious objection. In this report there is an item of $4,750,000 for buying and improving that part of Rock Creek south of Massachusetts Avenue to the Potomac River—a ravine, with steep-sided hills, so narrow at the bottom in some places that the bed of the stream crowds right to the shore, to the foothills of the banks, and it is proposed to buy that ravine, including cost of improvements, for the sum of $4,750,000. It costs, as the chairman of the committee says, about 60 or 70 cents per square foot. It costs, with estimated improvements, about $2,000 a city lot of 25 feet by 100. It costs about $32,000 an acre. What have we after we buy and improve it? It is merely a roadway, a link between the Potomac and Rock Creek Park, a driveway for automobiles, carriages, and equestrian uses, and it costs $4,750,000 improved, according to the report. Sometimes we are amazed when we see that railroads report spending $400,000 or $500,000 a mile for a four-track road over which limited trains run at more than a mile a minute, and the people want that sort of thing investigated, and when we build a park road from the Potomac to Rock Creek Park that costs $3,166,666 a mile, is there not a chance for investigation? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT].

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, in this half minute I can not say very much. All I want to say is that this is one of the best bills ever presented by the District of Columbia Committee during the six years that I have been here, and it ought to pass.

I want to extend my remarks in the RECORD and show wherein the statements even of the gentleman for whom I have such high respect, my colleague from New York [Mr. ANDRUS], are in error as to the figures which he has used. This bill ought to pass.

[By unanimous consent, Mr. OLCOTT was permitted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the amount of taxes which we collect from the District is fixed by law. It does not depend upon the amount of the expenditures. The expenditures depend upon the taxes, and this bill simply proposes to limit the current expenses of the Government, so that there shall be a surplus fund out of the current revenues which can be applied to permanent improvements of $1,230,000, and that is all it does do.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will not ask me anything in two minutes. That is all it does. It does not confer any additional authority upon the District Commissioners in any respect whatever. It confers no additional authority upon the Committee on Appropriations in any respect whatever. Every item in it not authorized by previous law will still remain subject to a point of order when it comes into the House. The District Commissioners may now estimate for $2,000,000 of public improvements if they wish to or they can estimate for $10,000,000 if they wish to. All this bill does is to require them to save out of the current revenues in making their estimates enough to estimate $1,270,000 for public improvements and a certain amount to repay the indebtedness of the District, and it does not make those items in order on an appropriation bill. It will still be simply an estimate, the same kind of an estimate the commissioners can now make.

The fear that gentlemen have that this will create a park system depends solely on what Congress will do in the future, because this will not make park systems in order. All it will do will be to have a fund of $1,230,000 which could be applied to public improvements, and which, if not applied to public improvements will be applied to the extinguishment of the debt.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Then, why put anything about parks in the bill?

Mr. MANN. Because they have to make their estimate include everything.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has six and a half minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Tennessee use some of his time?

Mr. SIMS. Is the gentleman going to use all of his time in one speech?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. SIMS. Then the gentleman should use some time. He only yielded two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How much time has the other side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee has nine minutes and the gentleman from Michigan six and a half minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, from a somewhat careful study of this bill and report I am obliged to entirely differ from the gentleman from Illinois in his views, and only desire in this one minute to show that the committee itself in making this report took a different view from what the gentleman has put upon it. This report says, on page 2:

> The only thing that is not being done at the present time is to effect those permanent or extraordinary improvements such as are essential in the case of Washington. These improvements can be made more economically if made systematically. The ample revenues eliminate any need for the borrowing of money. It is only necessary to make a program of expenditure, so that each item of work shall not be "new legislation," requiring, for consideration and appropriation, the action of four or more committees of Congress and the passage of a separate act.
> The bill is designed to carry out this idea of establishing a program.

Evidently one purpose of this bill is to authorize the various improvements mentioned in the report, extending over a period of 12 years. I believe in liberal improvements in the District, but think that Congress should not relinquish its power to designate what improvements shall be made and the order of their importance from year to year.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], a Member of the District Committee.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, the effect of this bill is that it fastens upon the United States Congress and the District for the next 12 years the same iniquitous system of fiscal revenue that has made this District the haven for the tax dodgers for years. It is to enable the District to carry on these expenditures for permanent improvements at the expense of the people of the country. Now, in 30 years, according to the statement of the engineer commissioner, they have only reduced their indebtedness to the United States about $5,000,000. The reason why they have only reduced their indebtedness $5,000,000 is because they have found a way to increase their expenditures and dump a floating debt upon the United States and get the money advanced to them by the Federal Treasury at 2 per cent. Now they propose to have not only $30,000,000 advanced and pay that back without any interest, but to charge 50 per cent of it to the Federal Treasury. According to the words of the bill, the commissioners—> shall provide in their estimates of appropriations for permanent work of improvements a sum not less than $1,230,000.

And are to increase that amount $100,000 every year. They are to estimate no less than $1,230,000. How much they are going to estimate depends upon how much more will be submitted to by this Congress. We are binding ourselves now for 12 years to a system of Uncle Sam paying 50 per cent of every important improvement in the District of Columbia. The time has long since come when the taxpayers living in this District ought to be put in a position where the District could easily take care of itself, if we were to undertake to tax the property in the District in any fair way. Under a Democratic Congress we will tax some of these tax dodgers and compel them to make returns to the District of Columbia, and there will be ample revenue in the District to carry on a system of improvements without paying 50 per cent of that which belongs to the people of this Government. I hope when the District Committee is reorganized in the Sixty-second Congress that the first thing will be to tax these tax dodgers on some of the personal property they have brought here into the District which escapes taxation and that opportunity will be given to avoid the criticism in the past that the United States Government has been ready and willing to further every one of these real-estate schemes. This bill ought to be voted down until such time as they choose to bring in a bill providing for the payment of the debt the District of Columbia owes to the United States. The only good feature about this bill is it provides the only measure that has ever been introduced for the payment of the indebtedness, and I want to say right now to the credit of the gentleman who is the chairman of the subcommittee on the District of Columbia that he is the man who has insist d upon the payment of this floating debt.

The last set of commissioners rolled up a floating debt deliberately and intentionally against the Treasury of the United States, in the hope that that floating debt would be turned in bonds, and then the United States would be bound for 50 per cent of those bonds, whereas before that the District of Columbia was liable for 100 per cent of the floating debt. But the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] has pursued the policy of compelling the District of Columbia to pay back annually a portion of that floating debt, until now it is less than $3,000,000. It ought to be all wiped out, and there is not a moral reason on earth why we should pay 50 per cent of the $10,000,000 worth of bonds. Those bonds never were issued on the credit of the United States and they are not now issued on the credit of the United States. The United States do not owe a dollar of them, and ought not to pay a dollar of this additional $20,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan has six minutes and a half remaining.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I regret that anyone, even the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], should feel constrained to say that this bill has been changed four times in 48 hours. This is a mistake. Fortunately I hold in my hand the bill which was read by the Clerk night before last with amendments, but at that time there was so much confusion in the House it was suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and others that it would be well if the chairman would print the bill as amended in the RECORD, which appeared the next morning, and is identical with the bill under consideration, except that on page 3, line 4 has been stricken out and line 5 to and including the word "purpose;" and in line 9, after the word "be," "hereafter" has been inserted, all at the request of Members who thought that we were providing for too many public improvements; and certainly, as these provisions for public improvements one after the other have been stricken out, it ought to be a matter from their standpoint of congratulation rather than of criticism and complaint.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not need any defense from such a charge.

Mr. SIMS. What interest does the engineer commissioner have in laying down financial plans, and so forth?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Simply the interests of 90,000,000 of people.

Mr. SIMS. That is not his function.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He is in line with his duties, I insist, and I regret that heretofore engineer commissioners in the discharge of their duty have not seen fit to do just exactly what the present engineer commissioner has done.

Mr. SIMS. He wants to raise the interest on the debt. Is that a part of the engineering scheme?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has in his remarks made some grave charges. I am wondering if by so doing he intended to indict all those who have taken a very deep interest in this proposed legislation, including the former as well as the present Commissioners of the District; the 16 members of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House, who voted for a favorable report on the bill when it carried more improvements than does the present bill; Members of both sides of the Chamber, including members of the Appropriations Committee, who have spoken in behalf of the bill, as well as others who would like to speak; Senators who likewise feel that this is wise legislation and who had hoped that it could be enacted into law during this session of Congress; the great body of citizens of the District of Columbia, as represented by the Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Trade; the four newspapers of the city, which have given the same their most cordial indorsement; and the President, who gave his hearty and emphatic indorsement in the following language:

> To this end I recommend the enactment into law of a bill now before Congress, and known as the Judson bill, which will insure the gradual extinguishment of the District's debt, while at the same time requiring that the many permanent improvements needed to complete a fitting capital city shall be carried on from year to year and at a proper rate of progress with funds derived from the rapidly increasing revenues.

There are those who feel that Washington has now all the parks that are needed, but as a matter of fact, comparing territory for territory, it will be shown that Washington has less than London, Paris, New York, or Boston, and we ought not in this connection to forget that parks in cities are not alone for the residents of those cities, but for the thousands who annually visit them and derive much pleasure and comfort in riding and walking about and through the beautiful and attractive parks that are found in the various cities of this country and in the cities of the Old World.

It is not often that in the presentation of legislation in this body that so much misunderstanding, prejudice, and misrepresentation is shown as has been exhibited in the discussion of this bill.

Gentlemen, I feel that this proposed legislation will be of such lasting benefit that I urge you one and all to vote for the same, feeling sure that as these improvements are consummated, consisting of parks and beautiful driveways encircling the city, we now and in the years to come will be proud that we had an opportunity to use our efforts in making this the most beautiful and attractive capital city in a Republic the greatest in all the world.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman use the balance of his time? Is the gentleman going to use it all in one speech?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, sir.

Mr. SIMS. There is only one speech on this side. I suggest the gentleman use his time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, it sometimes occurs that meritorious propositions of legislation are defeated because of the discovery of an imaginary "nigger in the woodpile." Some seem to think they have found one in the pending bill. I want to assure the House that this bill does not enlarge the powers of the District Commissioners in the slightest particular. On the contrary, it places a limitation upon power they now possess. And I want to say further that this bill does not change in the slightest particular the method of payment of the bonded indebtedness of the District of Columbia, one-half of which the General Government owes, but it does materially change the law with reference to the payment of the unfunded debt of the District of Columbia which is due by the District to the General Government.

When the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] and I came on to the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, which deals with District finances, the unfunded debt of this District, which is a debt due by the District to the General Government, as I have said, and which draws only 2 per cent interest, amounted to approximately $4,000,000. The law as it then was required that this unfunded debt should be liquidated within five years' time. The District Commissioners in framing their estimates disregarded this law, and year after year instead of estimating within the anticipated receipts of the city and decreasing this debt, they disregarded the law and estimated for amounts far beyond what they should, at one time two and one-half millions of dollars in excess of the anticipated revenues, resulting, as was said by the gentleman from Missouri, in an increase of the unfunded debt instead of diminishing it as the law plainly directed should be done. We required that estimates should come within their revenues, and adopted the policy of reducing this debt, and within the last few years we have brough. this indebtedness down to $2,400,000, and after the present appropriation bill, which has passed, takes effect it will amount to only $1,800,000. Under this bill this unfunded debt, instead of being increased, as has been the practice as I have shown, will be absolutely liquidated within seven years' time from this date.

Now, what else does this bill do? It places a limitation upon the power of the District Commissioners so that they can not, in making their estimates, absorb all of its revenues for current expenses. As was so forcibly said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], it says in plain terms to these officials, "You shall not absorb all the revenues of this District for current expenses, by increase of salary for a favorite class here and an increase for another set there, an enlargement of this department's force here and an enlargement of this division's force there, but you shall bring your estimate down to a common-sense basis, provide for current expenses and also set apart a substantial portion of the revenue to meet what has been termed permanent or extraordinary improvements. In other words it provides for an intelligent and systematic plan for expending the District revenues.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan has one and a half minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BURLESON. Just one minute more. It sets apart a part of the revenues to meet what have been termed permanent improvements. If the gentleman will give me just a few minutes more I can finish.

Mr. SIMS. I can not give the gentleman any time. Yonder is the gentleman [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] who can give the gentleman time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has one and one-half minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to prove to this House in one minute what is the real object of this bill. [Applause.] I propose right here and now to every gentleman supporting this bill: If you will begin, on line 15 of page 2, and strike out all the real estate part of this bill and leave every bit of the fiscal part of it in, I will vote for it and work for its passage. Will you do it? [Applause.]

No. The nigger in the woodpile is a nigger in such a little woodpile that it is all nigger and no woodpile. [Laughter and applause.] This is a $20,000,000 scheme to buy land that nobody will have, land that nobody can use, by act of Congress. Is this a good bill? Is this the best bill ever introduced in Congress, as claimed by some of its supporters? I will prove to you how good a bill it is. If this is such a good bill, why do you want to ram it through the House on a motion to suspend the rules? [Applause.] That of itself shows what it is. The bill that has been reported has been on the calendar ever since June, 1910.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Our committee never had a day allotted to us on which to consider it.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know why you grab up this indefensible and abominable measure and try to jam it through this House over every other bill from your committee on the calendar. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. What is the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. SIMS. I have not time to go into particulars. I tried to get an hour or 40 minutes on each side, and that side shut down on debate on this new-born measure, which they did not want anybody to know anything about. [Laughter and applause.] Whenever a man has a good bill he is naturally anxious to take time on it and let everybody else have time.

In the closing days of the last Congress a bill similar to this was sought to be jammed through here, two years ago, on a motion to suspend the rules, and part of the identical land referred to in that bill is to be included in this nefarious scheme. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I will never vote here to give to any one man, be he an engineer commissioner or the President of the United States, the power to fasten a liability of $20,000,000 on this Government for the purpose of buying a few old frog ponds, a few old ash dumps, to enable real-estate speculators of this city to do as they are now doing, as I understand, getting options on every old dump pile on the outskirts and trying to get a bill passed through this Congress in its dying hours to authorize their purchase by the Government at most extravagant prices. [Applause.]

If you think you can ram through a measure of this kind under a motion to suspend the rules, you are wrong. Let me call on all the Members of this House to think before they vote, and let me particularly call upon those Members of this House who do not want to reenter private life to think before they vote for this proposition. If you do, you will not be here very much longer. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], members of the District Committee, are fighting this bill tooth and toenail, and the bill is supported only by the chairman of the District Committee, who asserts that this is the most valuable bill that has ever been reported.

The District Committee has not reported this bill. It is true that some of the provisions contained in it have been favored by the committee, but let me say, gentlemen, if you ram this sort of thing through in this way you will ram yourselves out of public life. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may be permitted to state the proposition that he made before.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee be permitted to state his proposition.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, go ahead, and let us have a vote, and then bring in another bill. If it is a decent bill I will support it. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has one-half minute.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is a grave charge which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] makes when he claims that the real-estate men of this city are behind this measure. The President of the United States, William Howard Taft, than whom no man since the days of George Washington has taken more interest in this city and its development, says——

Mr. SIMS. Are you with the President in favor of reciprocity? That is a cause in which you would do well to follow him. [Applause and laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 87, nays 151, answered "present" 7, not voting 138, as follows:

OREGON LANDS.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 30280, with the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, with the committee amendments. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 30280) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to exchange certain desert lands for lands within national forests in Oregon, with the committee amendments, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the State of Oregon is hereby authorized to relinquish its selection heretofore made under the terms of the act of August 18, 1894 (28 Stats., 372), and acts amendatory and supplemental thereto of the following lands:

Section 3; east half, east half of west half, southwest quarter of southwest quarter of section 4; southwest quarter, west half of southeast quarter, southeast quarter of southeast quarter of section 5; south half of section 6; all of sections 7, 8, 9, 10, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22 of township 24 south, range 33 east, Willamette meridian, containing 8,793.47 acres; and the Secretary of the Interior, upon recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, may issue patent to said lands in exchange for and upon reconveyance to the United States of the following lands within national forests in the State of Oregon:

All of fractional section 36, township 21 south, range 12 east; all of section 16, township 21 south, range 12 east; the southeast quarter of section 36, township 20 south, range 14 east; all of section 16, township 23 south, range 16 east; the south half of northwest quarter, the northwest quarter of northwest quarter, the northeast quarter of northeast quarter, the south half of section 16, township 28 south, range 10 east; south half of north half of section 16, township 15 south, range 31 east; northwest quarter of northwest quarter of section 16, township 17 south, range 32 east; all of section 36, township 3 south, range 47 east; all of section 16, township 19 south, range 31 east; southeast quarter of southeast quarter of section 16, east half of northeast quarter, west half of northwest quarter of section 36, township 20 south, range 33 east; all of section 16, township 3 south, range 41 east; south half and northwest quarter of section 36, township 19 south, range 32 east; north half of section 16, township 14 south, range 33 east; all of sections 16 and 36, township 7 south, range 34 east; section 16, township 8 south, range 32 east; all of section 36, township 14 south, range 35½ east; all of section 36, township 2 south, range 40 east, Willamette meridian.

Provided, That the timber or undergrowth shall not have been removed from said forest lands: Provided further, That upon reconveyance to the United States the lands shall become parts of the national forests in which they are situated.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. ROBINSON. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, a second is ordered. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ELLIS] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to 20 minutes.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that this is a bill which proposes to exchange 8,793 acres of desert land, which has been selected under the Carey Act for reclamation, being desert lands. It is situated in the county of Malheur, southeastern Oregon, upon a high plateau, in a desert region, where there is a great scarcity of water. These parties have attempted to reclaim the land by an artesian project. They have expended a great deal of money, but thus far have not sufficient water to satisfy the State so that they could get certificate as to reclamation. Now, they desire to go on and further prosecute the artesian project and try to perfect the reclamation of the land, but it is difficult to do so within the limited time they have before the State selection will expire in 1912.

They own in fee simple 9,401 acres of timberland in the various forest reserves, which were school lands, and have been selected and bought outright by them. They have a fee simple title, which they got at an expense of about $40,000. They only desire to exchange these lands for the 8,793 acres of the Government, and the Government give them a title to the desert lands in lieu of the several tracts of lands described in the report, and all within forest reserves.

The lands are not now a part of the forest reserve, but they are within the reserves and belong to individuals. By the amendment of the committee attached to this bill it is provided that if this exchange takes place it immediately becomes a part of the forest reserve. No part of this land has been cut over, and it is as it was originally.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is true that the Government will acquire a larger area of land by this exchange than it gives?

Mr. ELLIS. Over 600 acres.

Mr. ROBINSON. The character of the land is desert land of a potential timber value?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is "a potential timber value?"

Mr. ELLIS. The report states that the potential timber value is what it will bring for pasturage by leasing it to the stockmen in the vicinity or by the sale of matured timber they can sell from it. The amount of timber is estimated in the report, and runs as high as $2.50 to $5 and gives the number of thousand feet of board measure per acre. It is the purpose to preserve it with other timber in the forest reserve.

Mr. ROBINSON. The district forester seems to think that the Government gets the better of the transfer in this proposed legislation.

Mr. ELLIS. He says the Government gets the better of the trade if the lands we get in return are desert lands. There can be no question about that. I know the lands that the people are seeking to reclaim, and they will not produce anything until water can be put upon them. If they can make a success of it, the lands will become valuable, but not as valuable as some in a latitude not so high.

But it is their purpose to try to reclaim it in small tracts of 160 acres by artesian water and sell that off in smaller tracts, and go on until they can reclaim the entire tract. They are not able to finance the matter and reclaim the entire 8,000 acres by this system.

Mr. ROBINSON. The lands which the Government is to acquire by this proposed legislation are lands now in private ownership within forest reserves.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes; they are in private ownership within forest reserves. They will pass from private ownership into the ownership of the Government, and, instead of being as they are now, they would then be subject to all the laws of the Government pertaining to forest reserves and under the direct supervision of the Government. They are not at this time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the approximate value of these lands now owned by the private individuals within forest reserves?

Mr. ELLIS. They cost something over $40,000. The estimate, I think, of the forester is—their value—$45,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is the present value?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is that valued for timber purposes or agricultural?

Mr. ELLIS. Largely timber and pasture; not very much for agriculture.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And they propose to trade that land for some desert land?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the value of the desert land?

Mr. ELLIS. That is largely speculative. Unless these people can get artesian water and reclaim it, it is valueless.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the possible motive that inspires private individuals to want to trade $40,000 worth of property for property of questionable value?

Mr. ELLIS. They feel hopeful that they can reclaim this land. They can interest additional capital in the project if they can control it; but as it is to-day, not having control over it and being unable to assure them they can go on to completion of these projects, they can not interest anyone in it. Therefore they are unable to finance the thing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are already interested in the land they desire to procure?

Mr. ELLIS. Oh, yes; the Government has already turned it over to the State, and they have until June, 1912, to handle it as it now exists.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If they succeed in irrigating the land, it will be of much greater value than the land they are relinquishing?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes; it would be of some greater value; but, of course, that is speculative. They may never be able to reclaim it or they may reclaim only a part of it. If they should happen to get artesian water, it would be all right. They have spent a great deal of money——

Mr. LONGWORTH. How much money have they expended on it?

Mr. ELLIS. Several thousand dollars. I am unable to state the exact amount.

Mr. ROBINSON. Are any of the lands the Government proposes to exchange for these lands mineral in character?

Mr. ELLIS. No.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to consume the time allotted to me in the consideration of this bill. I know of no objection to the passage of this legislation. The bill is unanimously reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, and I believe that the measure should pass, and unless some gentleman on this side of the House or on the other desires time, I shall consume no further time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

CONSTITUTION OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 295, approving the constitution formed by the constitutional convention of the Territory of New Mexico, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the constitution formed by the constitutional convention of the Territory of New Mexico, elected in accordance with the terms of the act of Congress entitled "An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, etc.," approved June 20, A. D. 1910, which said constitutional convention met at Santa Fe, N. Mex., on the 3d day of October, A. D. 1910, and adjourned November 21, A. D. 1910, and which constitution was subsequently ratified and adopted by the duly qualified electors of the Territory of New Mexico, at an election held according to law, on the 21st day of January, A. D. 1911, being republican in form, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and complying with the terms of said enabling act, be, and the same is hereby, approved, subject to the terms and conditions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution reaffirming the boundary line between Texas and the Territory of New Mexico," approved on the 16th day of February, A. D. 1911.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? Is any gentleman opposed to the resolution?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, if anyone here is opposed to the measure, I will not demand a second myself, otherwise I want to demand a second.

The SPEAKER. No one opposed to the bill demanding a second, the gentleman from Missouri will be recognized to demand a second and a second under the rule is ordered. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON. Gentlemen will remember that in the last session of Congress, on June 20, we passed an enabling act to permit the people of New Mexico to adopt a constitution and become a State. That enabling act also permitted the people of Arizona to adopt a constitution and become a State, but the Arizona constitution has not yet arrived. By the terms of the enabling act we provided for the election of delegates to a constitutional convention and empowered them to frame a constitution. We provided also for the ratification of the constitution or the nonratification of the constitution. On the 21st day of January of this year a vote was taken upon the constitution as adopted by the constitutional convention provided for in the enabling act, and the constitution was ratified by a majority of something over 18,000. By the terms of the enabling act we provided that the election should be confined to an election for the ratification of the constitution, so that no other question should be submitted to the people. We provided that if the constitution should be republican in form, not in conflict with the Declaration of Independence, and should conform to the terms of the enabling act, it might be submitted to Congress and to the President, and if Congress should approve and the President should approve, then, upon notice by the President to the governor of the Territory, an election of State officers might be held. On the 24th day of February just passed the President by a message to Congress approved of this constitution. The constitution came to the House, was referred to the Committee on the Territories. That committee has gone over it and finds it to be republican in form, not in conflict with the Declaration of Independence, and in conformity with the enabling act, and therefore has reported in favor of the approval of the constitution by Congress.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question there?

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Does the gentleman from Michigan understand that the approval of Congress is necessary——

Mr. HAMILTON. To the constitution?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Does the gentleman understand that the approval of Congress is necessary to complete the admission of New Mexico as a State?

Mr. HAMILTON. There was an alternative proposition, if Congress should not disapprove and the President should approve, but it is necessary that this constitution should be approved if we do not mean to let it pass over into the next session of Congress.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman my understanding of the language in section 4 of the enabling act is this: That while the approval of the President is necessary, the approval of Congress is not, and that it would take the disapproval of Congress to nullify the approval of the President.

Mr. HAMILTON. The provision, giving a free translation of it to the gentleman from Colorado, as I recall it, is that if Congress shall approve and the President shall approve, upon notice by the President to the governor the election of State and other officers shall be had, or if the Congress shall not disapprove during the next regular session and the President shall approve, then upon notice by the President to the governor an election of State and other officers shall occur.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. When is that session, this one?

Mr. HAMILTON. I think not; therefore I think it is necessary it should be approved.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Your understanding is this: That if this Congress should fail to approve the New Mexico constitution, the next Congress would have the entire session in which to act in the way of disapproval?

Mr. HAMILTON. That is substantially it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. So that the constitution would not become operative until the entire next session of Congress had expired in the event the next session did not take any action.

Mr. HAMILTON. And I understand the Attorney General's opinion is in conformity——

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question? In the report of the committee upon the question of the acceptance of their constitution you do not undertake to pass upon the question of liking or disliking the constitution.

Mr. HAMILTON. No.

Mr. JAMES. But you merely pass upon the question as to whether or not the Constitution is republican in form and complies with the enabling act.

Mr. HAMILTON. Precisely.

Mr. JAMES. So that is the precedent to be established here by the passage of this bill?

Mr. HAMILTON. So far as this constitutes a precedent, it is.

Mr. JAMES. It would certainly constitute a precedent coming from the gentleman's committee with a unanimous report.

Mr. HAMILTON. It is a unanimous report.

Mr. JAMES. And the precedent would be that Congress had no right to pass upon the constitution as to whether they like or dislike its provisions, but only the right to reject it upon the ground that it was not republican in form, or that it violated the provisions of the enabling act.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman from Kentucky trying to interject a partisan proposition in this for the purpose of passing the resolution or defeating the resolution?

Mr. JAMES. No, sir. I am trying to interject the constitutional right of the admission of States to the Union in the debate that may be called to the mind of the gentlemen on the other side at a later day. If the gentleman from Illinois can tell me some political question that was suggested by the question I asked, I would like to know what it is.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman plainly was aiming at a partisan question.

Mr. JAMES. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Then I am sorry I attributed motives to the gentleman which he did not have.

Mr. JAMES. I merely suggested a question of whether or not the people who have made a constitution could have it rejected simply because the people who had to pass upon it did not like it.

Mr. HAMILTON. I take it the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] has no ulterior motive.

Mr. JAMES. I take it that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would think that I was suggesting something political if I suggested that the people had a right to have something to say.

Mr. MANN. The Republican Party believes that the people have something to say.

Mr. JAMES. There are some elements of the gentleman's party that believe the people have something to say in a sort of a way.

Mr. MANN. When the gentleman from Kentucky assumes that he holds the people in his hands, it is likely to be partisan.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, my hands are not large enough to hold the people, nor are the gentleman's.

Mr. KEIFER. This colloquy that has been going on would indicate that there was action taken by your committee that looked as though you could not reject the constitution by reason of certain things in it. Did the committee pass upon that question?

Mr. HAMILTON. The committee found nothing in this constitution that would warrant it in rejecting the constitution.

Mr. KEIFER. They recognized the right to look into it, did they not?

Mr. HAMILTON. Undoubtedly, and that was the purpose for which that clause was put into the enabling act.

Mr. KEIFER. Has it not been the case all along, through the history of the admission of the States, especially back in the days of Kansas and Nebraska, that the Congress of the United States has passed on constitutions and determined whether they would admit the States or not?

Mr. HAMILTON. Certainly. In the case of Missouri, in the case of Nebraska, and in the case of Michigan, for illustration.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Would the gentleman permit a further interruption?

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. While I agree with the answers of the gentleman from Michigan——

Mr. HAMILTON. I want to say this to the gentleman from Colorado that, while I want to answer all inquiries, there is one other matter that is rather important that I wish to call the attention of the House before I sit down, and I want to yield a little time to some other members of the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to say that, while I agree with the answers of the gentleman from Michigan as to these provisos in the enabling act, I feel inclined to criticize the character of the provisos themselves, because under conditions that are quickly to ensue in Congress I believe that the matter of the approval of the Arizona constitution will be left wholly with the President, and that Congress will be virtually powerless in the matter.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is possible. I can see conditions, I will say to the gentleman from Colorado, where that might be possible, but that provision in the enabling act was intended in the broadest way to give to Congress a power which I think it has never exercised before in connection with the admission of States.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And that is the power of disapproval?

Mr. HAMILTON. That is the power of disapproval. Heretofore the constitution was submitted to the President of the United States, and if he, the President of the United States, found the constitution to be republican in form, not in conflict with the Declaration of Independence, and in conformity with the enabling act, he had the power to approve that constitution.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. Certainly.

Mr. SULZER. The passage of this act admits New Mexico as a State?

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes; that is to say, it is an essential step toward admission.

Mr. SULZER. I understand that President Taft has already approved the constitution of New Mexico?

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes; by message to Congress.

Mr. SULZER. Exactly. Now, why not admit the Territory of Arizona at the same time. Is there any reason for not doing that?

Mr. HAMILTON. We can not act upon the Arizona constitution because the constitution of Arizona has not arrived. That is a very good reason.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman does not know of any reason why there would be any objection to the admission of Arizona?

Mr. HAMILTON. I have not had an opportunity to read the constitution of Arizona. Of course the gentleman from New York would not expect me to pass upon the provisions of that constitution without having seen it.

Mr. SULZER. I was indulging the hope that both of these Territories would come in at the same time, inasmuch as the enabling acts were passed at the same time.

Mr. HAMILTON. I will say to the gentleman from New York—and I think he knows the history of my service in that connection—that for several years I have been in my service here in Congress an earnest friend of both of those Territories and have desired statehood for them. But the constitution of Arizona has not yet arrived.

Mr. SULZER. I know that the gentleman from Michigan has done everything he could to promote legislation to admit these Territories, and that is the reason why I was making these inquiries, to find out why it was that we are now passing this legislation to admit New Mexico and not passing legislation also to admit Arizona.

Mr. HAMILTON. There is no discrimination. It is simply because the constitution of Arizona has not yet arrived. We have not yet been called upon to act upon it. The constitution of New Mexico was referred to the committee for action. The constitution of Arizona has not arrived, and we have no jurisdiction, therefore.

Mr. SULZER. Of course that is a good reason.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan this question, prompted by the answer of the gentleman from Michigan to the question of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN]: Did I understand the gentleman from Michigan to say that it was left optional with the President of the United States to admit or not admit?

Mr. HAMILTON. Oh, no. I said that in the enabling act we had provided that if the Congress shall approve and the President shall approve, then the President shall notify the governor of the Territory, whereupon the governor of the Territory shall proceed to call an election of State officers. But if Congress shall not disapprove during the next regular session of Congress and the President shall approve, then the same proceeding is to be gone through.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was not the question of the gentleman from Colorado as to whether the President approved or did not approve the constitution of Arizona?

Mr. HAMILTON. I know the gentleman from Colorado asked me whether Congress had the power to approve or disapprove. That is my recollection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. My proposition is that Congress has only the power of disapproval.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The language of the Constitution is that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union." I could not see how, if Congress approved, the President himself could prevent a State from coming into the Union.

Mr. HAMILTON. I think myself that the terms of the enabling act are so plain and unmistakable that no misunderstanding is possible.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I request that the gentleman from Michigan be given 10 minutes in addition to the time he has already had. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] be given 10 minutes more.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HAMILTON. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman from Colorado, that he ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] for a little time, so that I can make a statement to the House about an important matter that I have not had opportunity to touch upon. Some of the Members of the House, and perhaps all, have known that there was a controversy between the State of Texas and the Territory of New Mexico about a boundary. Some years ago, in 1859, a survey was run known as the Clarke survey, beginning at the northeast corner of New Mexico, at the intersection of the one hundred and third meridian and the thirty-seventh parallel, running thence south to latitude 36.30, thence jogging westerly, and then running south, parallel to the one hundred and third meridian, to the thirty-second parallel, and thence running west to the Rio Grande. Legislation has been had from time to time confirming that so-called Clarke survey. Finally the people of New Mexico, under the terms of this enabling act, through their constitutional convention, adopted this constitution. It was then found that they had made a mistake in their boundary, making their eastern boundary the one hundred and third meridian. Thereupon, on the 16th day of November—it is important that Members should get the sequence of events here—a joint resolution was passed by Congress and approved by the President, declaring the Clarke survey to be the proper boundary line between New Mexico and Texas, and declaring that any boundary which differed from that should not be the true boundary. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] recollects the facts very well. I have stated the gist of it, have I not?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is correct; and in 1891 Congress also confirmed the Clark line.

Mr. HAMILTON. I so stated, only I did not give the year.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And the State of Texas in 1892 confirmed it.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is true.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And the Texas State government had patented up to this line.

Mr. HAMILTON. Now, the purpose of this statement is to call attention to a clause which we have incorporated in this joint resolution of approval, to wit, that we approve of the constitution of New Mexico, subject to the terms and conditions of the joint resolution of February 16, 1911, on the theory that some one in the future might possibly say that, notwithstanding the fact that Congress had defined the boundaries of New Mexico in the joint resolution of February 16, 1911, yet by the terms of this joint resolution of approval we had superseded the joint resolution of February 16, 1911. In order to save all question as to that boundary for all time to come we put into this enabling act the statement that we approved this constitution, subject to the terms and conditions of the joint resolution of February 16, 1911.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is entirely satisfactory to the State of Texas, and also not in conflict with the act passed this year and the one passed in 1892.

Mr. HAMILTON. It is exactly in conformity with it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It carries out the wishes of the State of Texas.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON. I wanted to yield a little time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE. I have made arrangements with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States have from time to time shown a disposition to want New Mexico and Arizona to become States of the American Union. There has been very much difficulty in securing proper recognition of those two Territories. In the last Congress an enabling act was passed which gave statehood under proper conditions to both of these Territories. New Mexico has had its convention and has adopted its constitution. Following the adoption of that constitution it was ratified by the people by a very decided vote. At the election that was held on the 21st day of January there were about 46,000 votes cast, and at that election there was a majority in favor of the constitution of nearly 19,000. So that nearly two-thirds of the votes cast were cast in favor of the constitution.

It is the duty of Congress, as I understand it, to determine whether the constitution which the people have adopted, and the constitution which has been ratified by them at the polls, is republican in form. The Committee on Territories has very carefully investigated this instrument, and while there are provisions in the instrument that I would not put in it, and there are other provisions which I would put in it, if I was fixing that constitution, my judgment is, and that is the judgment of the committee, that the only thing upon which we are to pass is to determine whether this constitution is republican in form, and whether it complies with the provisions of the enabling act.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. I will.

Mr. HOBSON. I have just now received the printed hearings before the committee They have not been available before, and I have not been able to get them, although I have been after them for several days since my attention was called to this matter. I do not think that any of the Members have had them.

Mr. LLOYD. That is true; they were not published until yesterday; they were not available for distribution until this morning.

Mr. HOBSON. Would there be any objection to postponing the consideration of this measure until to-morrow?

Mr. LLOYD. It is very necessary that this bill should be passed now in order that the Senate may take action on it before the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. HOBSON. Could not the Senate act independently of the House?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir. Gentlemen will observe that these hearings comprise a large book. The committee has given unusual consideration to the matter. There has been some objection to this constitution. The objection came from the Anti-Saloon League and from some other individuals who made objections on the ground that the election was not properly conducted, and that on the day of the election the saloons in some places were open in violation of the statute of that Territory.

Mr. HOBSON. Have those matters been investigated?

Mr. LLOYD. We very carefully investigated in the limited time we had, and if the gentleman will examine the hearings he will ascertain that there are affidavits from every county in the Territory of New Mexico—one or more in most cases, and as many as 25 affidavits in some cases—to the effect that the election was properly conducted, that the ballots were properly distributed, and that there was peace and order, and that everyone had an opportunity to vote in accordance with his conviction.

My own judgment is, from a careful investigation of the testimony, that there were some places where the saloons were open on that day in violation of the Territorial law, but on the other hand I do not think that because a saloon may happen to be open in violation of the law that that fact alone vitiates the election.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. Was there testimony before your committee to the effect that individuals were not permitted to vote?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir; there was only one instance, as far as I remember it, where an individual was not permitted to vote. One individual testified that he went to the polling place and asked for a ballot. He asked for a ballot aganst the constitution. He was informed that there were no ballots there against the constitution. He says he then said, "Give me one in favor of it, and I will scratch out the word 'for' and write the word 'against,'" and he was notified by the judge that that would not be legal. He then said, "I will write my ballot," and they said that a written ballot was in violation of the law. [Laughter.] That is the one instance where the law was not properly executed.

Mr. ROBINSON. That would not change the result, would it?

Mr. LLOYD. No; it would not change the result. Now, there is another objection urged to the election, and that is that the largest vote that was ever polled in the Territory was about 57,000 votes. At this election there were a little over 45,000 votes, so that 12,000 of the 57,000 did not vote; but it is a fact that if the vote of every one of the absent voters were counted, and counted against the adoption of the constitution, there would then be a majority of over 7,000 votes in favor of the adoption of the constitution.

Mr. ROBINSON. The vote in support of the constitution was more than a majority of the whole vote?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado rose.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Colorado begins, I desire to make one suggestion, and that is that this Congress is interested, I assume, in something about the nature of this constitution, and not about any breaches of the peace that were committed on the day the constitution was adopted. I think we would like to hear something on that subject.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I have not anything whatever to offer either upon the constitution or the happenings on the day of election when it was ratified by the people of New Mexico, but it seems to me, under the terms of the enabling act, that this action on the part of the House is a sort of empty ceremony, and that really, aside from the question of delay, in the long run it makes no difference to the people of New Mexico whether we approve or disapprove of their constitution. I will say frankly that I had hoped there would be some way in which we could tie together the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as States of the Union, because, as Members all know, it has been reported in the public press that because of certain so-called radical provisions in the constitution of Arizona the President will not approve that instrument when it comes up to him for approval. I looked into the enabling act to ascertain whether it was possible for Congress to tie those two States together and make the approval of the constitution of one of them by Congress a condition precedent to the approval of the other, so that they would stand on the same basis and both be admitted or refused admission together. But I find that after the President approves these constitutions he submits them to Congress, and if Congress fails to approve, the constitution becomes effective, as though Congress approved.

Now, that would create this situation. Suppose this Congress failed to approve this constitution. Suppose this vote to-day were to be adverse, and it sent this constitution over to the next Congress, at which time that of Arizona would have arrived. We would have the control of the House of Representatives in one political party and of the Senate in the other political party, and this House might approve the Arizona constitution and disapprove that of New Mexico, and its entire action would be a nullity and the session would go by, for the Senate might take the other position, approve the New Mexico constitution and disapprove that of Arizona. So Congress would virtually take no action whatever. It would take the action of both Houses to effect a disapproval, and the consequence is that under the conditions that have been brought about in Congress politically, the final say in this matter is in the hands of the President, and the apparent power conferred upon Congress is a mere empty ceremony.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I think this debate has demonstrated one fact that will be of some value to us hereafter when we come to pass upon the constitutions of other States, and that is that the unanimous report of this committee made by the chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], has established this well-settled doctrine which we hope will guide the House hereafter, and that is this: The first thing we are to inquire, when we pass on the constitution of a State we have admitted into the Union, Is it the will of the people; second, is it in conformity with the enabling act; and, third, is it republican in form? When these three things are established in the affirmative, the power of Congress is at an end. Congress has no power, nor has the President any power, to say that he will reject a constitution or for us to say that we will reject a constitution, simply because if we had been making that constitution we would not have put into it the provisions that are contained there. This is a republican form of government. It is grounded upon the bedrock of popular will, and when the people make their constitution you have no right to keep a State out of the Union because that constitution contains, for instance, the initiative and referendum, or the recall system, or the Oregon plan of electing United States Senators, or some other provision you may not like. You are brought up to the sole and lone proposition, first, is it republican in form; second, is it in conformity with the provisions of the enabling act; third, is it the will of the people? If these things are established, then the power of Congress is at an end and the power of the President is at an end. Under our Constitution neither Congress nor the President has the power to make constitutions for States admitted to the Union; the people of the States themselves do that, and this thing of trying to scare or sandbag States into suppressing the popular will, or making an unprogressive constitution, by saying Congress will not approve it or the President will not approve it if you do, does not meet my approval nor that of this House nor the country. [Applause.] These new States ought to profit by the mistakes of the old ones and write the remedy in their constitutions.

So far as I am individually concerned, I should have been glad if Arizona and New Mexico both might have had their constitutions passed on by Congress at the same time, so that we might have an example of some gentleman opposing one constitution because it is too republican or democratic in form and upholding another constitution because it is not so republican in form. But Arizona's constitution, we are told, is not here. I am informed that it was adopted by a vote of 3 to 1. I do not know whether I would have supported that constitution or all the provisions contained in it if I had been in that convention—I have not had the time to examine it thoroughly—but one thing I do know and that is it is the will of that people, and if it is the will of the people of Arizona and conforms to these provisions that I have enumerated the duty of Congress is plain and that is to admit the State into the sisterhood of States of this great Republic. [Applause.] The constitution of New Mexico, conforming to the three propositions I have set forth, and which the committee' unanimously agrees is the sum total of the power of Congress when passing upon the constitution of States to become a part of our great Union, I am going to support this bill to accept their constitution, for it is their will, being republican in form and in conformity with the enabling act. I do not know whether or not this election was fair. I am willing to take the word of my colleague from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] and the members of the committee, who have so thoroughly examined into that question, that the election was fair. [Applause.]

I am willing to trust the people who make their own laws; they are just, they are honest, they bear the burdens of supporting the State, they defend it in an hour of peril; if they make a mistake, they are those who suffer and therefore quick to remedy it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has but three minutes.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield that to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE].

[Mr. COLE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted therefor, the joint resolution was passed.

ALLOWANCE FOR LOSS OF DISTILLED SPIRITS DEPOSITED IN INTERNAL-REVENUE WAREHOUSES.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the privileged bill, the bill H. R. 29466.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 29466) to provide an allowance for loss of distilled spirits deposited in internal-revenue warehouses.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk proceeded with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, this bill is made up largely of figures. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill will be read under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 29466) to provide an allowance for loss of distilled spirits deposited in internal-revenue warehouses.
